PRÆTIDES, the daughters of Prætus, king of Argolis, were three in number, Lysippe, Iphinoe, and Iphianassa. They became insane for neglecting the worship of Bacchus, or, according to others, for preferring themselves to Juno, and they ran about the fields believing themselves to be cows, and flying away not to be harnessed to the plough or to the chariot. Prætus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their insanity, but he refused to employ him when he demanded the third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Prætus was punished, the insanity became contagious, and the monarch at last promised Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would restore them and the Argian women to their senses. Melampus consented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the most beautiful of the Prætides. Some have called them Lysippe, Ipponoe, and Cyrianassa. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 43.—Ovid. Met. 15.—Lactant. ad Stat. Theb. 1 and 3.

PRÆTUS, a king of Argos, son of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acrisius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This dissention between the two brothers increased with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acrisius prevailed, and Prætus left Peloponnesus and retired to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by some Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father-in-law, he made himself master of Tirynthus. Stenobœa had accompanied her husband to Greece, and she became by him mother of the Præitides, and of a son called Megapenthes, who, after his father's death, succeeded on the throne of Tirynthus. (vid. Stenobœa.) Homer. Il. 6, v. 160.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.

PROGNE, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, by Zeuxippe. She married Tereus king of Thrace, by whom she had a son called Itylus, or Itys. (vid. Philomela.)

PROMETHËI JUGUM and ANTRUM, a place on the top of Mount Caucasus in Albania.

PROMËTHEUS, a son of Iapetus by Clymene, one of the Oceanides. [vid. the end of this article.] He was brother to Atlas, Menœtus, and Epimetheus, and surpassed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himself. He sacrificed two bulls, and filled their skins, one with the flesh and the other with the bones, and asked the father of the gods, which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and chose the bones, and from that time the priests of the temples were ever after ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the flesh and the bones altogether. To punish Prometheus and the rest of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the son of Iapetus out-witted the father of the gods. He climbed the heavens by the assistance of Minerva, and stole fire from the chariot of the sun, which he brought down upon the earth at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he sent her to Prometheus, with a box of the richest and most valuable presents which he had received from the gods. (vid. Pandora.) Prometheus, who suspected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimetheus marry her, and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury, or Vulcan, according to Æschylus, to carry this artful mortal to Mount Caucasus, and there tie him to a rock, where, for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminished, though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about thirty years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. The vulture, or, according to others, the eagle, which devoured the liver of Prometheus, was born from Typhon and Echidna. According to Apollodorus, Prometheus made the first man and woman that ever were upon the earth, with clay which he animated by means of the fire which he had stolen from heaven. On this account, therefore, the Athenians raised him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games in his honour. During these games there was a race, and he who carried a burning torch in his hand without extinguishing it, obtained the prize. Prometheus, as it is universally credited, had received the gift of prophecy, and all the gods, and even Jupiter himself, consulted him as a most infallible oracle. To him mankind are indebted for the invention of many of the useful arts; he taught them the use of plants, with their physical power, and from him they received the knowledge of taming horses and different animals, either to cultivate the ground or for the purposes of luxury. [Banier supposes the fable of Prometheus to be merely a continuation of the history of the Titans. Prometheus, as he conjectures, was not exempt from the persecutions which harassed the other Titans. As he returned into Scythia, which he durst not quit so long as Jupiter lived, that god is said to have bound him to Caucasus. This prince, addicted to astrology, frequently retired to Mount Caucasus, as to a kind of observatory, where he contemplated the stars, and was as it were preyed upon by continual pining, or rather by vexation, on account of the solitary and melancholy life which he led. This is supposed to have given rise to the fable of the vulture preying upon his vitals. Banier farther imagines that Jupiter, having ordered all the forges where iron was worked to be shut, lest the Titans should make use of it against him, Prometheus, who had retired into Scythia, there established good forges. Perhaps also, not thinking to find fire in that country, he brought some thither in the stalk of the ferula, in which it may easily be preserved for several days. As for the two oxen which Prometheus is said to have slain that he might impose upon Jupiter, this part of the fable is said to be founded upon his having been the first who opened victims with a view of drawing omens from an inspection of their entrails. His having formed and animated a man refers to his having taught the barbarous people among whom he settled to lead a more civilized life. Sir Isaac Newton makes Prometheus a nephew of Sesostris, and to have been left by him upon Mount Caucasus, with a body of troops, in order to guard his conquests in this quarter. Some make him the same with Noah, an opinion which Bryant adopts. Le Clerc supposes him to have been the same with Magog. The truth, however, appears to be that Prometheus is in some way connected with the mythology of India, and with the progress of religion from east to west.] *Hesiod. PRONAPIDES, an ancient Greek poet who was, according to some, preceptor to Homer. It is said that he first taught the Greeks how to write from the left to right, contrary to the custom of writing from the right to the left which is still observed by some of the eastern nations. Diod. 3.

PROPERTIUS (Sextus Aurelius,) a Latin poet born in Umbria. [Critics do not agree respecting the name of his native city. Hispellum, Assisium, Bevagna, and six others, dispute this honour.] His father was a Roman knight, whom Augustus proscribed because he had followed the interest of Antony. He came to Rome, where his genius and poetical talents soon recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful. Mæcenas, Gallus, and Virgil, became his friends, and Augustus his patron. Mæcenas wished him to attempt an epic poem, of which he proposed the emperor for the hero; but Propertius refused, observing that his abilities were unequal to the task. He died about 19 years before Christ, in the 40th year of his age. His works consist of four books of elegies, which are written with so much spirit, vivacity, and energy, that many authors call him the prince of the elegiac poets among the Latins. His poetry, though elegant, is not free from faults, and the many lascivious expressions which he uses, deservedly expose him to censure. Cynthia, who is the heroine of all his elegies, was a Roman lady, whose real name was Hostia, or Hostilia, of whom the poet was deeply enamoured. [When Propertius abandons the elegiac tone for the didactic he sometimes raises himself to a dignified elevation. In general, however, he is too fond of a display of erudition. Had he not imitated so closely the poems of Callimachus and Philetas, but trusted more to his own powers, it is probable that he would have excelled Tibullus, to whom he is decidedly superior in the vividness of his colourings and in the force of his expressions. One peculiarity distinguishes the versification of Propertius from that of all the other Latin poets: his pentameters often terminate in a polysyllable, while those of Tibullus and Ovid end almost always in a word of two syllables, forming at one time an iambus, at another a pyrrhic. Critics are not agreed whether this is the result of accident or design on the part of Propertius. It is certain, however, that the plan pursued by Tibullus and Ovid is far more conducive to harmony.] The best edition is that of Santenius, 4to. Traj. ad Rh. 1780, and, when published together with Catullus and Tibullus, those of Grævius, 8vo. Utr. 1680, and of Vulpius, 4 vols. Patavi, 1737, 1749, 1755, and the edition of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754. [Two very good editions of Propertius separately have since appeared; that of Barthius, Lips. 1777, 8vo. and that of Lachmann, Lips. 1816, 8vo.] *Ovid. PROPERTIDES, some women of Cyprus, severely punished by Venus, whose divinity they had despised. They sent their daughters to the sea-shore, where they prostituted themselves to strangers. The poets have feigned that they were changed into stones, on account of their insensibility to every virtuous sentiment. Justin. 18, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 238.

PROPONTIS, a sea which has a communication with the Euxine by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Ægean by the Hellespont, now called the Sea of Marmora. It is about [90 miles long, and received its name from its lying in front of or before the Pontus Euxinus. Its modern name is derived from that of the island Proconessus. It is called also the White Sea. The ancient name alludes to its being in front of the Pontus Euxinus. (πρὸ-Ποντος).] Mela, 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2.—Ovid. 1. Trist. 9, v. 29.—Propert. 3, el. 22.

PROSERPINA, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Persephone. [The name, according to some, is a corruption from Περσεφώνη; others, however, derive it from proserpo, and make Proserpina the goddess who presides over the blade of corn when it has sprouted forth from the earth: cum seges proserperit.] She was so beautiful, that the father of the gods himself became enamoured of her, and deceived her by changing himself into a serpent, and folding her in his wreaths. Proserpine made Sicily the place of her residence, and delighted herself with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid streams, which surrounded the plains of Enna. In this solitary retreat, as she amused herself with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. [vid. Pluto.] Ceres was so disconsolate at the loss of her daughter, that she travelled all over the world, but her inquiries were in vain, and she never could have discovered whither she had been carried, had not she found the girdle of Proserpine on the surface of the waters of the fountain Cyane, near which the ravisher had opened himself a passage to his kingdom by striking the earth with his trident. Ceres soon learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to punish the ravisher. Jupiter in vain attempted to persuade the mother that Pluto was not unworthy of her daughter, and when she saw that she was inflexible for the restitution of Proserpine, he said that she might return on earth, if she had not taken any aliments in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impossible. Proserpine, as she walked in the Elysian fields, had eaten seven of the seeds of a pomegranate, and Ascalaphus was the only one who saw it, and for his discovery the goddess instantly turned him into an owl. Jupiter, to appease the resentment of Ceres, and sooth her grief, permitted that Proserpine should remain six months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that she should spend the rest of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell and wife of Pluto, Proserpine presided over the death of mankind, and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die if the goddess herself, or Atropos her minister, did not cut a lock of hair from the head. From this superstitious belief, it was usual to cut off some of the hair of the deceased, and to strew it at the door of the house as an offering for Proserpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worship to Proserpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had risen from the earth at the very place where Pluto had opened himself a passage, they annually sacrificed there a bull, of which they suffered the blood to run into the water. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and she was known by the different names of Core, Theogamia, Labitina, Hecate, Juno inferna, Anthesphoria, Cotylo, Deos, Libera, &c. Plut. in Luc.—Par. 8, c. 37, l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. PROSPER, one of the fathers who died A. D. 466. [Prosper was merely a layman, but was possessed of much learning and eloquence. He was a native of Gaul, and the friend of St. Augustine. In the year 440 he was made secretary to Pope Leo 1st, and became the principal combatant against the Pelagians in Italy.] His works have been edited by Mangeant, fol. Paris, 1711.

PROTAGORAS, a Greek philosopher of Abdera in Thrace, who was originally a porter. He became one of the disciples of Democritus, when that philosopher had seen him carrying faggots on his head, poised in a proper equilibrium. [Democritus was struck also with the neatness with which the faggots were packed, and pleased with his general manner. He therefore bade Protagoras follow him, saying that he would present him with a greater and better object for the exercise of his talents.] He soon rendered himself ridiculous by his doctrines, and in a book which he published, he denied the existence of a Supreme Being. This doctrine he supported by observing, that his doubts arose from the weakness of the human understanding, and from the shortness of human life. This book was publicly burnt at Athens, and the philosopher banished from the city as a worthless and contemptible being. Protagoras visited, from Athens, different islands in the Mediterranean, and died in Sicily in a very advanced age, about 400 years before the Christian era. He generally reasoned by dilemmas, and always left the mind in suspense about all the questions which he proposed. Some suppose that he was drowned. Diog. 9.—Plut. in Protog.

PRŒTESILÆUS, a king of part of Thessaly, son of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandson of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimedea, the mother of Jason. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acastus, and some time after he departed with the rest of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 sail. He was the first of the Greeks who set foot on the Trojan shore, and as such he was doomed by the oracle to perish, therefore he was killed, as soon as he had leaped from his ship, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the person who killed him. His wife Laodamia destroyed herself when she heard of his death. [vid. Laodamia.] Protesilaus had received the patronymic of Phylacides, either because he was descended from Phylacus, or because he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan shore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which, as soon as they could be discovered and seen from Troy, immediately withered and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and suffered the same vicissitude. Homer. Il. 2, v. 205.—Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 1.—Herod. 13, v. 17.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—Hygin. fab. 103, &c.

PROTEUS, a sea-deity, son of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to some, of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune because he had tended the monsters of the sea, and from his knowledge of futurity mankind received the greatest services. He usually resided in the Carpathian Sea, and, like the rest of the gods, he reposed himself on the sea-shore, where such as wished to consult him generally resorted. He was difficult of access, and when consulted he refused to give answers, by immediately assuming different shapes, and, if not properly secured in fetters, eluding the grasp in the form of a tiger, or a lion, or disappearing in a flame of fire, a whirlwind, or a rushing stream. Aristæus and Menelaus were in the number of those who consulted him, as also Hercules. Some suppose that he was originally king of Egypt, known among his subjects by the name of Cetes, and they assert that he had two sons, Telconus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had also some daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. [According to Diodorus Siculus, he was king of Egypt, and after the manner of the Egyptian monarchs, sometimes used a lion, and sometimes a bull for his crest. He is said to have reigned 240 years after Moses, and been distinguished for his knowledge of astronomy.] Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—*Hesiod. PROTOGÈNES, a painter of Rhodes who flourished about 328 years before Christ. He was originally so poor that he painted ships to maintain himself. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became sensible of the merit of their countryman, and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for seven years in finishing a picture of Jalyus, a celebrated huntsman, supposed to have been the son of Apollo, and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lutes and water, thinking that such aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not seem to make him more successful in the perfection of his picture. He was to represent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with satisfaction to himself; and when all his labours seemed to be without success, he threw his sponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the utmost labours of art could not do; the fall of the sponge upon the picture represented the froth of the mouth of the dog in the most perfect and natural manner, and the piece was universally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his representations, and copied nature with the greatest nicety, but this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius besieged Rhodes, he refused to set fire to a part of the city which might have made him master of the whole, because he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found closely employed in a garden in finishing a picture; and when the conqueror asked him why he showed not more concern at the general calamity, he replied that Demetrius made war against the Rhodians and not against the fine arts. Paus. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—*Eliau. PROXENUS, [a Bœotian, one of the commanders of the Greek forces in the army of Cyrus the younger. He was put to death with his fellow-commanders by Artaxerxes. Proxenus was the one who induced Xenophon to join in the expedition of Cyrus, and after the death of Proxenus, Xenophon was chosen to supply his place.]

PRUDENTIUS (Aurelius Clemens,) a Latin poet who flourished A. D. 392, and was successively a soldier, an advocate, and a judge. [He was born at Calagurris (Calahorra), or, according to a less probable opinion, at Cæsaraugusta (Saragossa.) At the age of 50 years he abandoned the world to pass the remainder of his days in devotion. It was at this period that he composed the works which have come down to us.] His poems are numerous, and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Augustan age, and yet greatly valued. [Prudentius is sometimes styled "the first Christian poet;" a title, however, which means but little. In no case can he be compared with the classic writers.

He is even decidedly inferior to Claudian and Ausonius.] The best editions are the Delphin, 4to. Paris, 1687; that of Cellarius, 12mo. Halæ, 1703; and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to. 1788.

PRUSA, a town of Bithynia, [at the foot of Mount Olympus, in the district Olympena.] It is now Bursa.] It was built by king Prusias, from whom it received its name. [vid. Cios.] Strab. 12.—Plin. 10, ep. 16.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, who flourished 221 B. C.—Another, surnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war against Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Prusias, complained before the Romans of the hostilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was sent from Rome to settle the disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favour, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian to whom he was indebted for all the advantages he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Prusias was obliged by the Roman ambassador to make a restitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanness he continued to enjoy the favours of the Romans. When some time after he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, calling himself the freed-man of the Romans; and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviours, and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects: and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Some say that his son became his murderer. Prusias, according to Polybius, was the meanest of monarchs, without honesty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman to render his deformities more visible. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin. 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Anib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

PRYTANES, certain magistrates at Athens who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased, festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The prytanes were elected from the senators which were in number 500, fifty of which were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the name of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and into another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the prytanes presided one full month.—Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called prytanes.

PSAMĀTHE, one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus, king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 398.—Flacc. v. 364.

PSAMMENĪTUS, succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him, and as he knew that the Egyptians paid the greatest veneration to cats, the Persian monarch placed some of these animals at the head of his army; and the enemy, unable to defend themselves, and unwilling to kill those objects of adoration, were easily conquered. [Polyænus refers this to the taking of Pelusium.] Psammenitus was twice beaten at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus, however, raised seditions against the Persian monarch, and attempted to make the Egyptians rebel, for which he was put to death by drinking bull's blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the Christian era. Herodot. 3, c. 10, &c.

PSAMMITĪCHUS, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the sea-shore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt proved favourable to his cause; he joined the enemy, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks by whose valour he had recovered Egypt, he allotted them some territory on the sea-coast, patronized the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subjects. He made useless inquiries to find the sources of the Nile, and he stopped by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians who were marching against him. He died 617 years before the Christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the contest. He confined two young children and fed them with milk; the shepherd to whose care they were intrusted, was ordered never to speak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations. After some time the shepherd observed, that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Psammetichus made inquiries, and found that the word Beccos signified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumstance, therefore, it was universally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of greater antiquity. [This is a very childish story. The word uttered by the children was Bek, with the Greek termination it becomes Bekos. The children learned it from the cry of the goats, who suckled them.] Herodot. 2, c. 28, &c.—Polyæn. 8.—Strab. 16.—A son of Gordius, brother to Periander, who held the tyranny at Coriuth for three years, B. PSAMMIS, or PSAMMUTHIS, a king of Egypt, B. C. 376.

PSAPHIS, a town on the confines of Attica and Bœotia. There was there an oracle of Amphiaræus.

PSAPHO, a Libyan who taught a number of birds which he kept to say Psapho is a god, and afterwards gave them their liberty. The birds did not forget the words which they had been taught, and the Africans paid divine honours to Psapho. Jelian.

PSOPHIS, a town of Arcadia near the [junction of the Erymanthus and Aroanius.] It was called at first Erymanthus, and afterwards Phegia. Stat. Th. 4, v. 296.—Paus. 3, c. 24.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 607.—A river and town of Elis.

PSYCHE, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliss, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter, at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche, first mentioned by Apuleius, is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly to imitate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man had just expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above as if rising from the mouth of the deceased.

PSYCHRUS, a river of Thrace. When sheep drank of its waters they were said always to bring forth black lambs. Aristot.

PSYLLI, a people of Libya near the Syrtes, very expert in curing the venomous bite of serpents, which had no fatal effect upon them. [They were destroyed by the Nasamones, a neighbouring people. It seems very probable that the Nasamones circulated the idle story respecting the destruction of the Psylli, which Herodotus relates, without, however, giving credit to it. He states that a south wind had dried up all the reservoirs of the Psylli, and that the whole country, as far as the Syrtes, was destitute of water. They resolved, accordingly, after a public consultation, to make an expedition against the south wind, but having reached the deserts, the south wind overwhelmed them beneath the sands.] Strab. 17.—Dio. 51, c. 14.—Lucan. 9, v. 894, 937.—Herodot. 4, c. 173.—Paus. 9, c. 28.

PTOLEMÆUS 1st, surnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, son of Arsinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia, married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. [vid. Lagus.] Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia, he became one of the friends and associates of Alexander, and, when that monarch invaded Asia, the son of Arsinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition he behaved with uncommon valour; he killed one of the Indian monarchs in single combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general division of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his share the government of Egypt, with Libya, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. In this appointment the governor soon gained the esteem of the people by acts of kindness, by benevolence and clemency; and though he did not assume the title of independent monarch till 19 years after, yet he was so firmly established that the attempts of Perdiccas to drive him away from his possessions proved abortive: and Ptolemy, after the murder of his rival by Grecian soldiers, might have added the kingdom of Macedonia to his Egyptian territories. He made himself master of Cœlesyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coast of Syria, and when he had reduced Jerusalem, he carried above 100,000 prisoners to Egypt, to people the extensive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered these prisoners the most attached and faithful of his subjects by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy assumed the title of king of Egypt, and soon after reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with success against Demetrius and Antigonus, who disputed his right to the provinces of Syria; and from the assistance he gave to the people of Rhodes against their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. While he extended his dominions Ptolemy was not negligent of the advantages of his people. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of access, he built a tower to conduct the sailors in the obscurity of the night, [vid. Pharos,] and that his subjects might be acquainted with literature, he laid the foundation of a library, which under the succeeding reigns became the most celebrated in the world. He also established in the capital of his dominions a society called museum, of which the members, maintained at the public expense, were employed in philosophical researches, and in the advancement of science and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Christ. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the last ten years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities not only as a sovereign, but as a writer, and among the many valuable compositions which have been lost, we are to lament an history of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his successors were called Ptolemies from him. Paus. 10, c. 7.—Justin. 13, &c.—Polyb. 2.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.—The 2d, son of Ptolemy the first, succeeded his father on the Egyptian throne, and was called Philadelphus by Antiphrases, because he killed two of his brothers. He showed himself worthy in every respect to succeed his great father, and conscious of the advantages which arise from an alliance with powerful nations, he sent ambassadors to Italy to solicit the friendship of the Romans, whose name and military reputation had become universally known for the victories which they had just obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His ambassadors were received with marks of the greatest attention, and immediately after four Roman senators came to Alexandria, where they gained the admiration of the monarch and of his subjects, and by refusing the crowns of gold and rich presents which were offered to them, convinced the world of the virtue and of the disinterestedness of their nation. But while Ptolemy strengthened himself by alliances with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was disturbed by the revolt of Magas his brother, king of Cyrene. The sedition, however, was stopped, though kindled by Antiochus king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-established peace for some time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus the Syrian king married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her husband's kingdom, and assisted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 64th year of his age, 246 years before the Christian era. He left two sons and a daughter, by Arsinoe the daughter of Lysimachus. He had afterwards married his sister Arsinoe whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, and to whose memory he began to erect a celebrated monument, (vid. Dinocrates.) During the whole of his reign Philadelphus was employed in exciting industry, and in encouraging the liberal arts and useful knowledge among his subjects. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promises and presents to increase the number of the Egyptian subjects, and Ptolemy could boast of reigning over 33,339 well peopled cities. He gave every possible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterrean and the other in the Red Sea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army consisted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horse, besides 300 elephants and 2000 armed chariots. With justice therefore he has been called the richest of all the princes and monarchs of his age; and indeed the remark is not false when it is observed, that at his death he left in his treasury 750,000 Egyptian talents, a sum equivalent to two hundred millions sterling. His palace was the asylum of learned men, whom he admired and patronized. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and by increasing the library which his father had founded, he showed his taste for learning, and his wish to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200,000 volumes of the best and choicest books, and it was afterwards increased to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæsar's fleet when he set it on fire to save himself, a circumstance, however, not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is said that the Old Testament was translated into Greek during his reign, a translation which has been called Septuagint, because translated by the labours of 70 different persons. Eutrop.—Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut.—Theocrit.—Athen. 12.—Plin. 13, c. 12.—Dio. 42.—Gellius. 6, p. 17.—The 3d, succeeded his father Philadelphus on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war against Antiochus Theus, for his unkindness to Berenice the Egyptian king's sister, whom he had married with the consent of Philadelphus. With the most rapid success he conquered Syria and Silicia, and advanced as far as [Bactriana and the confines of India;] but a sedition at home stopped his progress, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the spoils of conquered nations. Among the immense riches which he brought he had above 2500 statues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyses had carried away into Persia when he conquered Egypt. These were restored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their sovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment of his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The last years of Ptolemy's reign were passed in peace, if we except the refusal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 silver talents which their ancestors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He also interested himself in the affairs of Greece, and assisted Cleomenes, the Spartan king, against the leaders of the Achæan league; but he had the mortification to see his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 221 years before Christ, after a reign of 25 years, and, like his two illustrious predecessors, he was the patron of learning, and indeed he is the last of the Lagides who gained popularity among his subjects by clemency, moderation, and humanity, and who commanded respect even from his enemies, by valour, prudence, and reputation. It is said that he deposited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians to be permitted to translate the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles, and that he forfeited the pledge. Plut. in Cleom. &c.—Polyb. 2.—Justin. 29, &c.—The 4th, succeeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt, and received the surname of Philopater by antiphrasis, because, according to some historians, he destroyed his father by poison. He began his reign with acts of the greatest cruelty, and he successively sacrificed to his avarice his own father, his wife, his sister, and his brother. He received the name of Typhon from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus because he appeared in the streets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the gestures of the priests of Cybele. In the midst of his pleasures, Philopater was called to war against Antiochus king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he soon invaded his enemy's territories, and might have added his kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent use of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he visited Jerusalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which insolence to his majesty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immense number of Jews to be exposed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants, but by a supernatural instinct, the generous animals turned their fury not on those that had been devoted to death, but upon the Egyptian spectators. This circumstance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindness to a nation which he had so lately devoted to destruction. In the latter part of his reign, the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened, but at the same time roused to superior activity, renewed, for political reasons, the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater at last, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, 204 years before the Christian era. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuousness and extravagance, and their carcases were dragged with the greatest ignominy through the streets of Alexandria. Polyb.—Justin. 30, &c.—Plut. in Cleom.—The 5th, succeeded his father Philopater as king of Egypt, though only in the 4th year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Sosicius and of Aristomenes, by whose prudent administration Antiochus was dispossessed of the provinces of Cœlosyria and Palestine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans also renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal, and the conclusion of the second Punic war. This flattering embassy induced Aristomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honourable office, and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the sceptre, and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and customs of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the surname of Epiphanes, or illustrious, and was crowned at Alexandria with the greatest solemnity, and the faithful Aristomenes resigned into his hands an empire which he had governed with honour to himself and with credit to his sovereign. Young Ptolemy was no sooner delivered from the shackles of a superior than he betrayed the same vices which had characterized his father, the counsels of Aristomenes were despised, and the minister who for ten years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was sacrificed to the caprice of the sovereign, who abhorred him for the salutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow. His cruelties raised seditions among his subjects, but these were twice quelled by the prudence and the moderation of one Polycrates, the most faithful of his corrupt ministers. In the midst of his extravagance, Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he showed himself eager to cultivate friendship with a nation from whom he could derive so many advantages, and during their war against Antiochus, he offered to assist them with money against a monarch, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the seditions he raised in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 24 years, 180 years before Christ, Ptolemy was poisoned by his ministers, whom he had threatened to rob of their possessions to carry on a war against Seleucus king of Syria. Liv. 35, c. 13, &c. — Justin. &c. — The 6th, succeeded his father Epiphanes on the Egyptian throne, and received the surname of Philometor, on account of his hatred against his mother Cleopatra. He was in the 6th year of his age when he ascended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by an eunuch who was one of his favourites. He made war against Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Palestine and Cœlosyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after several successes he fell into the hands of the enemy, who detained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometor, the Egyptians raised to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Evergetes, or Physcon, also son of Epiphanes; but he was no sooner established in his power than Antiochus turned his arms against Egypt, drove the usurper, and restored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus was soon comprehended by Philometor, and when he saw that Pelusium, the key of Egypt, had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Physcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of interest in the two royal brothers incensed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progress and obliged him to retire. No sooner were they delivered from the impending war, than Philometor and Physcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealousy to oppose each other's views. Physcon was at last banished by the superior power of his brother, and as he could find no support in Egypt he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compassion of the Romans, and to gain their assistance, he appeared in the meanest dress, and took his residence in the most obscure corner of the city. He received an audience from the senate, and the Romans settled the dispute between the two royal brothers by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Libya and Cyrene to Physcon, and confirming Philometor in the possession of Egypt and the island of Cyprus. These terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Physcon soon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was supported by the Romans, who wished to aggrandize themselves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refused to deliver up the island of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention he fomented the seeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor, 145 years before the Christian era, left Physcon master of Egypt and all the dependent provinces. Philometor has been commended by some historians for his clemency and moderation. Diod.—Liv.—Polyb. — The 7th Ptolemy, surnamed Physcon, on account of the prominence of his belly, ascended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor, and, as he had reigned for some time conjointly with him, (vid. Ptolemæus 6th.) his succession was approved, though the wife and the son of the deceased monarch laid claim to the crown. Cleopatra was supported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at last agreed that Physcon should marry the queen, and that her son should succeed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's son in her arms. He ordered himself to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refused to do it, and stigmatized him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil-doer, a surname which he deserved by his tyranny and oppression. A series of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to rid Egypt of his tyranny, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations, and fled from a place which continually streamed with the blood of their massacred fellow-citizens. If their migration proved fatal to the commerce and prosperity of Alexandria, it was of the most essential service to the countries where they retired; and the numbers of Egyptians that sought a safer asylum in Greece and Asia.

introduced among the inhabitants of those countries the different professions that were practised with success in the capital of Egypt. Physcon endeavoured to re-people the city which his cruelty had laid desolate; but the fear of sharing the fate of the former inhabitants, prevailed more than the promise of riches, rights, and immunities. The king at last, disgusted with Cleopatra, repudiated her, and married her daughter by Philometor, called also Cleopatra. He still continued to exercise the greatest cruelty upon his subjects, but the prudence and vigilance of his ministers kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had basely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or support in Egypt he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra, the divorced queen, ascended the throne. In his banishment Physcon dreaded lest the Alexandrians should also place the crown on the head of his son by his sister Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under these apprehensions he sent for the young prince, called Memphitis, to Cyprus, and murdered him as soon as he reached the shore. To make the barbarity more complete, he sent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birth-day. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who, being left without friends or assistance, fled to her eldest daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius king of Syria. This decisive blow restored Physcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for some time, hated by his subjects and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the 67th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, about 116 years before Christ. Some authors have extolled Physcon for his fondness of literature; they have observed, that from his extensive knowledge he was called the philologist, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, besides an history in 23 books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by succeeding authors whose pen was employed on the same subject. Diod.—Justin. 38, &c.—Athen. 2.—Porphyr.—The 8th, surnamed Lathyrus, from an excrescence like a pea on the nose, succeeded his father Physcon as king of Egypt. He had no sooner ascended the throne, than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus, and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander, her favourite son. Lathyrus, banished from Egypt, became king of Cyprus, and soon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war against Alexander Jannæus, king of Judea, through whose assistance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewish monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exercised the greatest cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, returned to Cyprus till the death of his brother.

Alexander restored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refused to acknowledge him as their sovereign, and Thebes, for its obstinacy, was closely besieged for three successive years, and from a powerful and populous city it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign Lathyrus was called upon to assist the Romans with a navy for the conquest of Athens, but Lucullus, who had been sent to obtain the wanted supply, though received with kingly honours, was dismissed with evasive and unsatisfactory answers, and the monarch refused to part with troops which he deemed necessary to preserve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died 81 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 36 years since the death of his father Physcon, eleven of which he had passed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, eighteen in Cyprus, and seven after his mother's death. He was succeeded by his only daughter Cleopatra, whom Alexander, the son of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla soon after married and murdered. Joseph. Hist.—Justin. 39.—Plut. in Luc.—Appian, in Mithrid.—The 9th, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 1st; for the 10th Ptolemy, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 2d; for the 11th, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 3d.—The 12th, the illegitimate son of Lathyrus, ascended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander 3d. He received the surname of Auletes, because he played skilfully on the flute. His rise showed great marks of prudence and circumspection, and as his predecessor by his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly established on his throne without the approbation of the Roman senate. He was successful in his applications, and Cæsar, who was then consul, and in want of money, established his succession, and granted him the alliance of the Romans, after he had received the enormous sum of about a million and 162,500*l.* sterling. But these measures rendered him unpopular at home, and when he had suffered the Romans quietly to take possession of Cyprus, the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom, and seek protection among the most powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome, at first with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had sent to justify their proceedings before the Roman senate, rendered him unpopular and suspected. Pompey, however, supported his cause, and the senators decreed to re-establish Auletes on his throne; but as they proceeded slowly in the execution of their plans, the monarch retired from Rome to Ephesus, where he lay concealed for some time in the temple of Diana. During his absence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herself absolute, and established herself on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a priest of Bellona's temple at Comana, but she was soon driven from Egypt, when Gabinus, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no sooner restored to power, than he sacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greatest ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius, a Roman who had supplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his restoration, about 51 years before the Christian era. He left two sons and two daughters, and by his will ordered the eldest of his sons to marry the eldest of his sisters, and to ascend with her the vacant throne. As these children were young, the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Great was appointed by the senate to be their patron and guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predecessors, and it is remarkable for no uncommon events, only we may observe that the young queen was the Cleopatra who soon after became so celebrated as being the mistress of J. Cæsar, the wife of M. Antony, and the last of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic. pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39.—Appian. de Civ.—The 13th, surnamed Dionysius or Bacchus, ascended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his sister Cleopatra, whom he had married according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great, [vid. Ptolemæus 12th,] but the wickedness and avarice of his ministers soon induced him to reign independent. He was then in the 13th year of his age, when his guardian, after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, came to the shores of Egypt, and claimed his protection. He refused to grant the required assistance, and by the advice of his ministers he basely murdered Pompey after he had brought him to shore under the mask of friendship and cordiality. To curry the favour of the conqueror of Pharsalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey, but Cæsar turned with indignation from such perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria he found the king of Egypt as faithless to his cause as to that of his fallen enemy. Cæsar sat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and sister to the throne; and, to satisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the possession of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children masters of the island of Cyprus. This fair and candid decision might have left no room for dissatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious ministers, and therefore he refused to acknowledge Cæsar as a judge or a mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for some time a prisoner in the hands of Cæsar, now headed his armies, but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempted to save his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about 46 years before Christ, and three years and eight months after the death of

Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became sole mistress of Egypt; but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæsar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy, who was then in the eleventh year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæs. in Alex.—Strab. 17.—Joseph. Ant.—Dio.—Plut. in Ant. &c.—Sueton. in Cæs.—Apion, king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon. The Romans presented his subjects with their independence. Liv. 70.—Ceraunus, a son of Ptolemy Soter, by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater. Unable to succeed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus, where he was received with friendly marks of attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lysimachus in a battle in Phrygia, but his reign was short, and Ceraunus perfidiously murdered him and ascended his throne 280 B. C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly established in Macedonia, as long as Arsinoe the widow, and the children of Lysimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful possession of their father. To remove these obstacles, Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arsinoe who was his own sister. The queen at first refused, but the protestations and solemn promises of the usurper at last prevailed upon her to consent. The nuptials, however, were no sooner celebrated, than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his usurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own, Antiochus, the son of Seleucus; Antigonus, the son of Demetrius; and Pyrrhus, the king of Epirus. These enemies, however, were soon removed; Ceraunus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and stopped the hostilities of his two other rivals by promises and money. He did not long remain inactive, a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, and the monarch immediately marched to meet them in the field. The battle was long and bloody. The Macedonians might have obtained the victory if Ceraunus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy, who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only 18 months. Justin. 24, &c.—Paus. 10, c. 10.—An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. Cato was at the head of the forces which were sent against Ptolemy by the senate, and the Roman general proposed to the monarch to retire from the throne, and to pass the rest of his days in the obscure office of high-priest in the temple of Venus at Paphos. The offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the ene-

He was a native of Alexandria, or, according to others, of Pelusium, and on account of his great learning he received the name of most wise, and most divine among the Greeks. [He has always been regarded as the prince of astronomers among the ancients, and in his works he has left us a complete body of the science. He corrected Hipparchus's catalogue of the fixed stars, and formed tables by which the motions of the sun, moon, and planets might be calculated and regulated. He digested the observations of the ancients into a system entitled, Μεγάλη Συνταξις, or Great Construction.] In this he has adopted and exhibited the ancient system of the world, placing the earth in the centre of the universe, a doctrine universally believed and adopted till the 16th century, when it was confuted and rejected by Copernicus. [By order of the kings of Arabia, in 827, this work was translated into Arabic, in which language it was styled Almagest, and from the Arabic it was translated into Latin, about the year 1230. The Greek text was first printed at Basle in 1538.] His geography is valued for its learning, and the very useful information which it gives. [In this he tells us that he follows the geography of Marinus of Tyre, but with numerous additions and corrections. Ptolemy has the merit of carrying into full execution and practice the invention of Hipparchus, for designating the situation of places by latitude and longitude, after it had lain dormant for more than 250 years; and though, for want of observations, it is far from being perfect, yet his work has been found very useful to modern geographers.] Besides his system and his geography, Ptolemy wrote other books, [such as "Recensio Chronologica," "De judiciis Astrorum," "Elementa Harmonica," &c.] The best edition of Ptolemy's geography is that of Bertius, fol. Amst. 1618, and that of his treatise de Judiciis Astrologiciis by Camerar, 4to. 1530, and of the Harmonica, 4to. Wallis, Oxon. 1683.

PTOLEMÆIS, a town of Thebais in Egypt, called after the Ptolemies, who beautified it. There was also another city of the same name in the territories of Cyrene. It was situate on the sea-coast, and, according to some, it was the same as Barce. [vid. Barce.]—A city of Palestine, called also Aco. [vid. Ace.] Mela, 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 2, c. 73.—Strab. 14, &c.

PUBLICŌLA, a name given to Publius Valerius, on account of his great popularity. vid. Valerius. Plut. in Pub.—Liv. 2, c. 8.—Plin. 30, c. 15.

PUBLILIA LEX, was made by Publius Philo, the dictator, A. U. C. 445. It permitted one of the censors to be elected from the plebeians, since one of the consuls was chosen from that body. Liv. 8, c. 12.—Another by which it was ordained that all laws should be previously approved by the senators before they were proposed by the people.

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a Syrian mimic poet, who flourished about 44 years before Christ. He was originally a slave sold to a Roman patrician, called Domitius, who brought him up with great attention, and gave him his freedom when of age. He gained the esteem of the most powerful at Rome, and reckoned J. Cæsar among his patrons. Cæsar gave him the prize over Laberius. (vid. Laberius.) [The mimes of Syrus were distinguished for the moral sentences which they contained. The actors of this kind of dramatic composition were accustomed to store their memories with moral precepts, of which they made use as occasion offered. The ancients speak of the mimes of Cyrus as worthy of a place among the finest productions of Roman literature. There only remain of them, however, 152 moral sentences which had been extracted for the purpose just alluded to. Some of the manuscripts are entitled "the Sentences of Publius Syrus and of Seneca;" this is owing no doubt to Seneca's having preserved some of them by his quotations. The sentences of Syrus are remarkable for the knowledge of life which they display, and for the simple and modest tone in which they are expressed. The latest edition is that of Tzschucke, in the "Auctores Latini Minores," Lips. 1790.]

PUBLIUS, a prænomèn common among the Romans.—A prætor who conquered Palæopolis. He was only a plebeian, and though neither consul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senators. He was the first who was honoured with a triumph during the prætorship.—A Roman consul who defeated the Latins, and was made dictator.

PUDICÏTIA, a goddess, who, as her name implies, presided over chastity. She had two temples at Rome. Festus. de V. sig.—Liv. 10. c. 7.

PULCHERIA, a daughter of the emperor Theodosius the Great, famous for her piety, moderation, and virtues.—A daughter of Arcadius, who held the government of the Roman empire for many years. She was mother of Valentinian. Her piety, and her private as well as public virtues have been universally admired. She died A. D. 452, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen.—A sister of Theodosius who reigned absolute for some time in the Roman empire.

PUNICUM BELLUM. The first Punic war was undertaken by the Romans against Carthage, B. C. 264. The ambition of Rome was the origin of this war. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with secret jealousy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cause of contention by settling, in three different treaties, the boundaries of their respective territories, the number of their allies, and how far one nation might sail into the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily, an island of the highest consequence to the Carthaginians as a commercial nation, was the seat of the first dissensions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuse to guard the town of Messana, but this tumultuous tribe, instead of protecting the citizens, basely massacred them, and seized their possessions. This act of cruelty raised the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero, king of Syracuse, who had employed them, prepared to punish their perfidy; and the Mamertini, besieged in Messana, and without friends or resources, resolved to throw themselves for protection into the hands of the first power that could relieve them. They were, however, divided the assistance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without hesitation or delay, the Carthaginians entered Messana, and the Romans also hastened to give the Mamertini that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerness as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their assistance, took up arms, and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Messana. Fresh forces were poured in on every side, and though Carthage seemed superior in arms and in resources, yet the valour and intrepidity of the Romans daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracusan king, who hitherto embraced the interest of the Carthaginians, became the most faithful ally of the republic. From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were masters at sea, the advantages they gained were small and inconsiderable. To make themselves equal to their adversaries, they aspired to the dominion of the sea, and in sixty days timber was cut down, and a fleet of 120 gallees completely manned and provisioned. The successes they met with at sea were trivial, and little advantage could be gained over an enemy that were sailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at last obtained a victory, and he was the first Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The defeat of the Ægates insulæ led the Carthaginians to sue for peace, and the Romans, whom an unsuccessful descent upon Africa, under Regulus, (vid. Regulus.) had rendered diffident, listened to the proposal, and the Punic war was concluded B. C. 241, on the following terms:—The Carthaginians pledged themselves to pay to the Romans, within twenty years, the sum of 3000 Euboic talents, they promised to release all the Roman captives without ransom, to evacuate Sicily and the other islands in the Mediterranean, and not to molest Hiero, king of Syracuse, or his allies. After this treaty, the Carthaginians, who had lost the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conquests in Spain, and soon began to repair their losses by industry and labour. They planted colonies, and secretly prepared to revenge themselves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not insensible of their successes in Spain, and, to stop their progress towards Italy, they made a stipulation with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to cross the Iberus, or to molest the cities of their allies the Saguntines. This was for some time observed, but when Annibal succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in Spain, he spurned the boundaries which the jealousy of Rome had set to his arms, and he immediately formed the siege of Saguntum. The Romans were apprized of the hostilities which had been begun against their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the active enemy before they had taken any steps to oppose him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined on by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian senate. Without delay or diffidence, B. C. 218, Annibal marched a numerous army [vid. Annibal] towards Italy, resolved to carry on the war to the gates of Rome. He crossed the Alps and the Appenines with uncommon celerity, and the Roman consuls who were stationed to stop his progress, were severally defeated. The battles of Ticinus, Trebia, and Thrasymenus, threw Rome into the greatest apprehensions, but the prudence and the dilatory measures of the dictator Fabius soon taught them to hope for better times. Yet the conduct of Fabius was universally censured as cowardice, and the two consuls who succeeded him in the command, by pursuing a different plan of operations, soon brought on a decisive action at Cannæ, in which 45,000 Romans were left in the field of battle. This bloody victory caused so much consternation at Rome, that some authors have declared that if Annibal had immediately marched from the plains of Cannæ to the city, he would have met with no resistance, but would have terminated a long and dangerous war with glory to himself and the most inestimable advantages to his country. This celebrated victory at Cannæ left the conqueror master of two camps, and of an immense booty; and the cities which had hitherto observed a neutrality no sooner saw the defeat of the Romans, than they eagerly embraced the interest of Carthage. The news of this victory was carried to Carthage by Mago, and the Carthaginians refused to believe it till three bushels of golden rings were spread before them, which had been taken from the Roman knights in the field of battle. After this Annibal called his brother Asdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement; but the march of Asdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himself slain. Affairs now had taken a different turn, and Marcellus, who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, soon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. In different parts of the world the Romans were making very rapid conquests, and if the sudden arrival of a Carthaginian army in Italy at first raised fears and apprehensions, they were soon enabled to dispute with their enemies for the sovereignty of Spain, and the dominion of the sea. Annibal no longer appeared formidable in Italy; if he conquered towns in Campania or Magna Græcia, he remained master of them only while his army hovered in the neighbourhood, and if he marched towards Rome, the alarm he occasioned was but momentary; the Romans were prepared to oppose him, and his retreat therefore the more dishonourable. The conquests of young Scipio in Spain had now raised the expectations of the Romans, and he had no sooner returned to Rome than he proposed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. This was a bold and hazardous enterprize, but though Fabius opposed it, it was universally approved by the Roman senate, and young Scipio was empowered to sail to Africa. The conquests of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehensive for the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their safety at home to the maintaining of a long and expensive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their orders with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no superior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general soon collected a large army, and met his exulting adversary in the plains of Zama. The battle was long and bloody, and though one nation fought for glory, and the other for the dearer sake of liberty, the Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had sworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had advised his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was decisive, the Carthaginians sued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were these: Carthage was permitted to hold all the possessions which she had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and institutions. She was ordered to make restitution of all the ships and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to surrender the whole of her fleet, except 10 galleys; she was to release and deliver up all the captives, deserters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Masinissa for all the losses which he had sustained; to deliver up all her elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of these animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever without the consent of the Romans, and she was to reimburse the Romans, to pay the sum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for fifty years, and she was to give up hostages from the noblest families for the performance of these several articles; and, till the ratification of the treaty, to supply the Roman forces with money and provisions. These humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B. C. and immediately 100 Roman captives were released, five hundred galleys were delivered and burnt on the spot, but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more severely felt, and many of the Carthaginian senators burst into tears. During the 50 years which followed the conclusion of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their losses by unwearied application and industry; but they found still in the Romans a jealous rival, and a haughty conqueror, and in Masinissa, the ally of Rome, an intriguing and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himself master of one of their provinces; but as they were unable to make war without the consent of Rome, the Carthaginians sought relief by embassies, and made continual complaints in the Roman senate of the tyranny and oppression of Masinissa. Commissioners were appointed to examine the cause of their complaints; but as Masinissa was the ally of Rome, the interest of the Carthaginians was neglected, and whatever seemed to depress their republic was agreeable to the Romans. Cato, who was in the number of the commissioners, examined the capital of Africa with a jealous eye; he saw it with concern, rising as it were from its ruins; and when he returned to Rome he declared in full senate, that the peace of Italy would never be established while Carthage was in being. The senators, however, were not guided by his opinion, and the delenda est Carthago of Cato did not prevent the Romans from acting with moderation. But while the senate were debating about the existence of Carthage, and while they considered it as a dependent power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redress, and Masinissa continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians resolved to do to their cause that justice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field against the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Masinissa who was then 90 years old. In this bold measure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them desperate, they hastened with all possible speed to the capital of Italy to justify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveness of the Roman senate. The news of Masinissa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately some forces were sent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to pass into Africa. The ambassadors of Carthage received evasive and unsatisfactory answers from the senate; and when they saw the Romans landed at Utica, they resolved to purchase peace by the most submissive terms which even the most abject slaves could offer. The Romans acted with the deepest policy, no declaration of war had been made, though hostilities appeared inevitable; and in answer to the submissive offers of Carthage the consuls replied that, to prevent every cause of quarrel, the Carthaginians must deliver into their hands 300 hostages, all children of senators, and of the most noble and respectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but it was no sooner granted than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue if they refused to deliver up all their ships, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military stores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 suits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful store of ammunitions and missile weapons were surrendered. After this duplicity had succeeded, the Romans laid open the final resolutions of the senate, and the Carthaginians were then told that, to avoid hostilities, they must leave their ancient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city, at the distance of not less than ten miles from the sea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the spirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguished in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to sacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to support a siege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with stones, to compensate for the weapons and instruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Asdrubal, whom the despair of his countrymen had banished on account of the unsuccessful expedition against Masinissa, was immediately recalled; and in the moment of danger Carthage seemed to have possessed more spirit and more vigour than when Annibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular siege begun. Two years were spent in useless operations, and Carthage seemed still able to rise from its ruins, to dispute for the empire of the world, when Scipio, the descendant of the great Scipio who finished the second Punic war, was sent to conduct the siege. The vigour of his operations soon baffled the efforts and the bold resistance of the besieged; the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city, which was twenty miles in circumference, was completely surrounded on all sides by the enemy. Despair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained access to the city walls, where the battlements were low and unguarded. His entrance into the streets was disputed with uncommon fury, the houses as he advanced were set on fire to stop his progress; but when a body of 50,000 persons of either sex had claimed quarter, the rest of the inhabitants were disheartened, and such as disdained to be prisoners of war perished in the flames which gradually destroyed their habitations, 147 B. C. after a continuation of hostilities for three years. During 17 days Carthage was in flames; and the soldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever possession they could. But while others profited from the destruction of Carthage, the philosophic general, struck by the melancholy aspect of the scene, repeated two lines from Homer, which contained a prophecy concerning the fall of Troy. He was asked by the historian Polybius, to what he then applied his prediction? To my country, replied Scipio, for her too I dread the vicissitude of human affairs, and in her turn she may exhibit another flaming Carthage. This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory caused the greatest rejoicings at Rome; and immediately commissioners were appointed by the Roman senate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demolish and burn the very materials with which they were made: and in a few days, that city which had been once the seat of commerce, the model of magnificence, the common store of the wealth of nations, and one of the most powerful states of the world, left behind no traces of its splendour, its power, or even of its existence. Polyb.—Orosius.—Appian. de Punic. &c.—Flor.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Strab.—Liv. epit.—Diod.

PUPIENUS, Marcus Claudius Maximus, a man of an obscure family, who raised himself by his merit to the highest offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a prætor, consul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blacksmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and to rid the world of the usurpation and tyranny of the Maximini, he immediately marched against these tyrants; but he was soon informed that they had been sacrificed to the fury and resentment of their own soldiers, and therefore he retired to Rome to enjoy the tranquillity which his merit claimed. He soon after prepared to make war against the Persians, who insulted the majesty of Rome, but in this he was prevented, and massacred A. D. 236, by the prætorian guards. Balbinus shared his fate. Pupienus is sometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and serious, he was the constant friend of justice, moderation, and clemency, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his virtues, than to say that he was invested with the purple without soliciting for it, and that the Roman senate said that they had selected him from thousands, because they knew no person more worthy or better qualified to support the dignity of an emperor.

PUPPIUS, a tragic poet in the age of J. Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage the audience melted into tears, from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosa, 1 ep. 1, v. 67.

PURPURARIÆ, two islands of the Atlantic on the African coast, now Lancarota and Fortaventura. [vid. Fortunatæ Insulæ.] Plin. 6, c. 31, l. 35, c. 6.

PUTEOLI, a maritime town of Campania, between Baïæ and Naples, founded by a colony from Cumæ. It was originally called Dicæarchea, [from the just administration of its government, δικαια, αγαρη,] and afterwards Puteoli, from the great number of wells that were in the neighbourhood. It was much frequented by the Romans, on account of its mineral waters and hot baths, and near it Cicero had a villa called Puteolanum. [The Romans made it the emporium of the commerce of the east; and indeed its situation as a sea-port is unrivalled. It stands on a point that juts out a little into the sea, nearly in the centre of a fine bay, called from it Puteolano or Puzzolano. It is easy to guess what the animation and splendour of Puteoli must have been at the time when the riches of the east were poured into its bosom, and when its climate, baths, and beautiful situation allured the most opulent Romans to its vicinity.] It is now called Pozzuoli, and contains instead of its ancient magnificence, not more than 10,000 inhabitants. Sil. 13, v. 385.—Strab. 5.—Varro L. L. 4, c. 5.—Cic. Phil. 8, c. 3, fam. 15, ep. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

PUSICULÆ, a place [on the Esquiline hill, without the gate,] where the meanest of the Roman populace were buried. [It was so called because the dead bodies were deposited in graves or pits, (in puteis.)] Part of it was converted into a garden by Mæcenas, who received it as a present from Augustus. [vid. Esquilæ.] Horat. 1, Sat. 8, v. 8.—Varro L. L. 4, c. 5.

PYANESPIA, an Athenian festival celebrated in honour of Theseus and his companions, who, after their return from Crete, were entertained with all manner of fruits, and particularly pulse. From this circumstance the Pyanepsia was ever after commemorated by the boiling of pulse, απο του εβειν πυανια. Some, however, suppose, that it was observed in commemoration of the Heraclidæ, who were entertained with pulse by the Athenians.

PYDNA, a town of Macedonia, originally called Citon, situate [at the junction of the Æsom and Leucos, north of the mouth of the Aliacon, on the shore of the Sinus Thermaicus.] It was in this city that Cassander massacred Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, his wife Roxane, and his son Alexander. Pydna is famous for a battle which was fought there on the 22d of June, B. C. 168, between the Romans under Paulus and king Philip, in which the latter was conquered, and Macedonia soon after reduced into the form of a Roman province. Justin. 14, c. 6.—Flor.—Plut. in Paul.—Liv. 44, c. 10.

PYGMEI, a nation of dwarfs in the extremest parts of India, or, according to others, of Æthiopia. [vid. the end of this article.] Some authors affirm, that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds, whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by Gerana, a princess, who was changed into a crane for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Hom. Il. 3.—Strab. 8.—Arist. Anim. 8, c. 12.—Juv. 13, v. 186.—Plin. 4, &c.—Mela, 3, c. 8.—Suet. in Aug. 83.—Philostr. Icon. 2, c. 22, mentions that Hercules once fell asleep in the deserts of Africa, after he had conquered Antæus, and that he was suddenly awakened by an attack which had been made upon his body by an army of these Lilliputians, who discharged their arrows with great fury upon his arms and legs. The hero, pleased with their courage, wrapped the greatest number of them in the skin of the Nemean lion, and carried them to Eurystheus. [Aristotle locates the Pygmies on the banks of the Nile, and as the cranes make their appearance there about the month of November, the time in which the waters subside, and devour the corn sown on the lands, the whole fable of the Pygmies may be explained by supposing them to have been none other than the Egyptians, and the term Pygmy not to refer to any diminutiveness of size, but to the πυγμῶν or cubits of the Nile's rise.]

PYGMALION, a king of Tyre, son of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father he ascended the vacant throne, and soon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He sacrificed every thing to the gratification of his predominant passions, and he did not even spare the life of Sichæus, Dido's husband, because he was the most powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sichæus was the priest; but, instead of obtaining the riches which he desired, Pygmalion was shunned by his subjects, and Dido, to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her husband's treasure, and a large colony to the coast of Africa, where she founded a city. Pygmalion died in the 56th year of his age, and in the 47th of his reign. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, Ital. 1.—A celebrated statuary of the island of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus, to which he was a witness, created in him such an aversion for the fair sex, that he resolved never to marry. The affection which he had denied to the other sex he liberally bestowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of marble which he had made, and at his earnest request and prayers, according to the mythologists, the goddess of beauty changed the favourite statue into a woman, whom the artist married, and by whom he had a son called Paphus, who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.

PYLADES, a son of Strophius, king of Phocis, by one of the sisters of Agamemnon. He was educated together with his cousin Orestes, with whom he formed the most inviolable friendship, and whom he assisted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by assassinating Clytemnestra and Egisthus. He also accompanied him to Taurica Chersonesus, and for his services Orestes rewarded him, by giving him his sister Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two sons, Medon and Strophius. The friendship of Orestes and Pylades became proverbial. [vid. Orestes.] Eurip. in Iphig.—Æschyl. in Ag. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 23.—A celebrated Greek musician, in the age of Philopœmen. Plut. in Phil.—A mimic in the reign of Augustus, banished, and afterwards recalled.

PYLÆ. The word Pylæ, which signifies gates, was often applied by the Greeks to any straits or passages which opened a communication between one country and another. [The Pylæ, Ciliciæ, Syria, Caspiæ or

Albania, were the most famous in Asia, and Thermopylæ in Greece. The Pylæ Ciliciæ were above Adana, in the range of Taurus, on the frontiers of Cappadocia; the Pylæ Syria, were on the frontiers of Syria and Cilicia, and were formed by Mount Amanus and the sea. For an account of the Pylæ Caspiæ vid. Caspiæ Pylæ; and for the Pylæ Caucasæ vid. Caucasus.]

PYLAGORÆ, a name given to the Amphictyonic council, because they always assembled at Pylæ, near the temple of Delphi.

PYLAS, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion his son-in-law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 39.

PYLOS, now Navaria, a town of Messenia, situate on the western coast of the Peloponnesus, [off which, to the north-west, lay] the island Sphacteria in the Ionian Sea. It was built by Pylus, at the head of a colony from Megara. The founder was dispossessed of it by Neleus, and fled into Elis, where he dwelt in a small town which he also called Pylos.—A town of Elis, [south-east of the city of Elis.]—Another town of Elis, called Triphyliaca, from Triphylyia, a province of Elis, where it was situate, [north of the Anigrus.] These three cities which bore the name of Pylos, disputed their respective right to the honour of having given birth to the celebrated Nestor son of Neleus. The Pylos, which is situate near the city of Elis, seems to win the palm, as it had in its neighbourhood a small village called Gerenus, and a river called Geren, of which Homer makes mention. Pindar, however, calls Nestor king of Messenia, and therefore gives the preference to the first mentioned of these three cities. Apollod. 1, c. 19, l. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 39.—Strab. 9.—*Homer. PYRA, part of Mount Cæta, on which the body of Hercules was burnt. Liv. 36, c. 3.

PYRACMON, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of Mount Ætna. The name is derived from two Greek words which signify fire and an anvil, [πυρ, ακμων.] [PYRAMIDES, famous monuments of Egypt, of massive masonry, which, from a square base, rise diminishing to a point or vertex when viewed from below. Some derive the word from πυρος, wheat, and αμμο, I collect, pretending that the first pyramids were built by Joseph for granaries. This derivation, however, is perfectly idle, as is also the idea of their being intended for granaries: they are of too solid a construction, and contain too little internal room to answer such a purpose. Others deduce it from πυρ, fire, because these structures end in a point like a flame. Wilkins derives it from two Coptic words, pouro, "a king," and missi, "a race," whence pyramis; and he says the pyramids were thus called, because they were erected to preserve the memories of the Egyptian kings and their families. A more satisfactory derivation, however, will be found below.

The pyramids commence immediately south of Cairo, but on the opposite side of the Nile, and extend in an uninterrupted range, for many miles in a southerly direction parallel with the banks of the river. The height of the first, which is ascribed to Cheops, is 477 feet, that is, forty feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and 133 feet higher than St. Paul's in London. The length of the base is 720 feet. The following are the dimensions of the second pyramid: The base 684 feet; the central line down the front from the apex to the base, 568; the perpendicular, 456; coating from the top to where it ends, 140. These dimensions being considerably greater than those usually assigned even to the first or largest pyramid, are to be accounted for by their being taken (by Belzoni) from the base as cleared from sand and rubbish, while the measurements of the first pyramid given by others, only applied to it as measured from the level of the surrounding sand. The antiquity of these erections, and the purpose for which they were formed, have furnished matter for much ingenious conjecture and dispute, in the absence of certain information. It has been supposed that they were intended for scientific purposes, such as that of establishing the proper length of the cubit, of which they contain in breadth and height a certain number of multiples. They were, at all events, constructed on scientific principles, and give evidence of a certain progress in astronomy; for their sides are accurately adapted to the four cardinal points. Whether they were applied to sepulchral uses, and intended as sepulchral monuments, had been doubted; but the doubts have in a great measure been dispelled by the recent discoveries made by means of laborious excavations. The drifting sand had, in the course of ages, collected around their base to a considerable height, and had raised the general surface of the country above the level which it possessed when they were constructed. The entrance to the chambers had also been, in the finishing, shut up with large stones, and built round so as to be uniform with the rest of the exterior. The largest, called the Pyramid of Cheops, had been opened, and some chambers discovered in it, but not so low as the base, till Mr. Davison, British Consul at Algiers, explored it in 1763, when accompanying Mr. Wortley Montague to Egypt. He discovered a room before unknown, and descended the three successive wells to a depth of 155 feet. Captain Caviglia, master of a merchant vessel, has lately pursued the principal oblique passage 200 feet farther down than any other former explorer, and found it communicate with the bottom of the well. This circumstance creating a circulation of air, he proceeded 28 feet farther, and found a spacious room 66 feet by 27, but of unequal height, under the centre of the pyramid, supposed by Mr. Salt to have been the place for containing the theca, or sarcophagus, though now none is found in it. The room is 30 feet above the level of the Nile. The upper chamber, 35½ feet by 17½, and 18½ high, still contains a sarcophagus. Herodotus erred in supposing that the water of the Nile could ever surround the tomb of Cheops. In six pyramids which have been opened, the principal passage preserves the same inclination of 26° to the horizon, being directed to the polar star. Belzoni, after some acute observations on the appearances connected with the second pyramid, or that of Chephrenes, succeeded in opening it. The stones which had constituted the coating, (by which the sides of most of the pyramids, which now rise in steps, had been formed into plain and smooth surfaces,) lay in a state of compact and ponderous rubbish, presenting a formidable obstruction; but somewhat looser in the centre of the front, showing traces of operations for exploring it, in an age posterior to the erection. On the east side of the pyramid he discovered the foundation of a large temple, connected with a portico appearing above ground, which had induced him to explore that part. Between this and the pyramid, from which it was 50 feet distant, a way was cleared through rubbish 40 feet in height, and a pavement was found at the bottom, which is supposed to extend quite round the pyramid; but there was no appearance of any entrance. On the north side, notwithstanding the same general appearance presented itself after the rubbish was cleared away, one of the stones, though nicely adapted to its place, was observed to be loose; and when it was removed, a hollow passage was found evidently forced by some former enterprising explorer, and rendered dangerous by the rubbish which fell from the roof; it was therefore abandoned. Reasoning by analogy from the entrance of the first pyramid, which is to the east of the centre on the north side, he explored in that situation, and found at a distance of 30 feet the true entrance. After incredible perseverance and labour, he found numerous passages, all cut out of the solid rock, and a chamber 46 feet 3 inches by 16 feet 3, and 23 feet six inches high. It contained a sarcophagus in a corner, surrounded by large blocks of granite. When opened, after great labour, this was found to contain bones, which mouldered down when touched, and, from specimens afterwards examined, turned out to be the bones of an ox. Human bones were also found in the same place. An Arabic inscription, made with charcoal, was on the wall, signifying that "the place had been opened by Mohammed Ahmed, lapicide, attended by the master Othman, and the king Alij Mohammed," supposed to be the Ottoman emperor, Mahomet I, in the beginning of the 15th century. It was observed, that the rock surrounding the pyramids, on the north and west sides, was on a level with the upper part of the chamber. It is evidently cut away all round, and the stones taken from it were most probably applied to the erection of the pyramid. There are many places in the neighbourhood where the rock has been evidently quarried, so that there is no foundation for the opinion formerly common, and given by Herodotus, that the stones had been brought from the east side of the Nile, which is only probable as applied to the granite brought from Syene. The operations of Belzoni have thrown light on the manner in which the pyramids were constructed, as well as the purposes for which they were intended. That they were meant for sepulchres can hardly admit of a doubt. Their obliquity is so adjusted as to make the north side coincide with the obliquity of the sun's rays at the summer solstice. The Egyptians connected astronomy with their religious ceremonies and their funerals, for zodiacs are found even in their tombs. It is remarkable that no hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in or about the pyramids as in the other tombs, a circumstance which is supposed to indicate the period of their construction to have been prior to the invention of that mode of writing, though some think that the variation may be accounted for by a difference in the usages of different places and ages. Belzoni, however, says that he found some hieroglyphics on one of the blocks forming a mausoleum to the west of the first pyramid. The first pyramid seems never to have been coated, as there is not the slightest mark of any covering. The second pyramid showed that the coating had been executed from the summit downward, as it appeared that it had not in this instance been finished to the bottom. A very curious enquiry now remains as to the labourers employed in erecting these stupendous structures. On the supposition that they were native Egyptians, Voltaire has founded an argument in proof of the slavery of that people; but that they were really natives is a point which admits of considerable doubt. The uniform practice of the ancient Oriental nations seems to have been, to employ captive foreigners in erecting laborious and painful works, and Diodorus (lib. 1, c. 2.) expressly asserts this of the Egyptian Sesostris. Is it improbable to suppose that, one at least, if not all, of the structures in question were the work of the Israelites? Bondage is expressly attributed to them in the sacred writings, and that the Israelites did not make brick only, but performed other labours, may be inferred from Exodus, ix. 8, 10. Moses took "ashes of the furnace," no doubt that which was tendered him by his people. So Psalm 81, v. 6, "I removed his shoulder from the burden, and his hands were delivered from the mortar-basket," not pots, as in our translation; and with this rendering agree the Septuagint, Vulgate, Symmachus, and others. Added to this we have the positive testimony of Josephus that the Israelites were employed on the Pyramids. The space of time allotted for the erection of these immense masses coincides with what is usually assigned to the slavery of the Israelites. Israel is understood to have been in Egypt 215 years; of which Joseph ruled seventy years: nor was it till long after his death that a "new king arose who knew not Joseph." If we allow about 40 years for the extent of the generation which succeeded Joseph, added to his seventy, there remains about 105 years to the Exodus. According to Herodotus (2, c. 124, seq.) Egypt, until the reign of Rhampsinitus, was remarkable for its abundance and excellent laws. Cheops, who succeeded this prince, degenerated into extreme profligacy of conduct. He barred the avenues to every temple, and forbade the Egyptians from offering sacrifices. He next proceeded to make them labour servilely for himself by building the first pyramid. Cheops reigned 50 years. His brother Chephrenes succeeded, and adopted a similar course; he reigned 56 years. Thus, for the space of 106 years, were the Egyptians exposed to every species of oppression and calamity: not having during all this period permission even to worship in their temples. The Egyptians had so strong an aversion to the memory of these two monarchs, that they would never mention their names, but always attributed their pyramids to one Philitis, a shepherd who kept his cattle in those parts. We have here very plain traces of a government by a foreign family; and of a worship contrary to that which had been previously established in Egypt, as appears in the prohibition of sacrifices. In its continuance moreover of 106 years it coincides with the bondage of the Israelites. There appears to be something mysterious concealed under the name and mention of the shepherd Philitis. It is clear that the Egyptians did not call the kings, by whose orders the pyramids were built, by this name, in the hearing of Herodotus, since they referred them to their kings Cheops and Chephrenes. It would seem, moreover, that the shepherd Philitis had formerly, and at other times, customarily, fed his cattle elsewhere. The following then may be regarded as the meaning of the passage in question: they attributed the labour of constructing the pyramids to a shepherd who came from Philistia, but who at that time fed his cattle in the land of Egypt. Implying, that they more readily told the appellation of the workman (the sons of Israel, the shepherd, Gen. 47, 5.) employed in the building, than of the kings by whose commands they were built. They seem to have pursued the same course in the days of Diodorus, who remarks, (lib. 1, c. 2.) "They admit that these works are superior to all which are seen in Egypt, not only by the immensity of their mass, and by their prodigious cost, but still more by the beauty of their construction; and the workmen, who have rendered them so perfect, are much more estimable than the kings who paid their cost: for the former have hereby given a proof of their genius and skill, whereas the kings contributed only the riches left them by their ancestors or extorted from their subjects. They say the first was erected by Armaeus, the second by Am- mosis, the third by Inaron." In the common Greek text we read Αμασις for the second name, but the best critics decide in favour of Αμμωσις. If we make a slight change also in the first name, and, instead of A-mæus (Αμασις), read Aramæus (Αραμωσις), the result will be a curious one. On comparing the names a Mosis, and in Aron, with the Hebrew description of Mosis and Aaron, we find that the proper appellation is the same, as near as pronunciation by natives of different countries could bring it: a Mosis or ha Mosis, is hu Mouseh in Hebrew; and in Aron or hin Aron, is written hu Aaron, which certainly, when two vowels came together, took a consonant between them, being spoken as if written hun Aaron. This testimony, therefore, agrees with the supposition that the Israelites were employed on the pyramids: first under the appellation of the Syrian, or Aramæan (the very title given to Jacob, Deut. 26, c. 5, "An Aramite ready to perish, &c."), and afterwards under the names of the two most famous leaders of that nation, Moses and Aaron. To those conversant with the Oriental disquisitions of Wilford, it seems hardly necessary to state how striking a coincidence he establishes between the ancient history of Egypt and the account given of the dynasties and customs of that country as drawn from the Hindoo Puranas. We are left under a strong impression, if we are not actually convinced, after their perusal, that there must have been a period when a Hindoo dynasty reigned by right of conquest in Egypt, and established in it the religion of Brahma. Why may not the "new king who knew not Joseph" have been a foreign invader? Indeed, on what rational ground can he be supposed to have been a prince of the former dynasty, and to have proved so soon forgetful of so great a national deliverance? Does not, moreover, the conduct of Cheops and Chephrenes in closing the temples of Egypt show their desire to establish a new system of worship? This idea receives no little degree of confirmation from the ingenious conjecture of Lacroze, (Hist. Christ. des Indes, p. 429.) respecting the etymology of the word pyramid. He derives it from the Sanserit term Biroumas, and traces an analogy between Brahma (Birma) and the Egyptian word Piromi. Lacroze observes that Brama, which the Indians of Malabar pronounce Biroumas, signifies the same as Piromis (an honest and virtuous man, Herod. 2, c. 144,) and that Piramia, in the language of Ceylon, means a man. Herodotus states in the passage just cited, that the priests of Egypt kept in a spacious building large images of wood, representing all their preceding high-priests, arranged in genealogical order; every high-priest placing his image there during his life. They mentioned to Hecateus, the historian, when they were showing this edifice to him, that each of the images he saw represented a piromis, begotten by another piromis. The word piromis, adds Herodotus, signifies in their language an honest and virtuous man. In a treatise "On Providence," by Synesius, the celebrated bishop of Cyrene, is a passage which coincides with, and is illustrative of, Herodotus. He says, "the father of Osiris and Typhon was at the same time a king, a priest, and a philosopher. The Egyptian histories also rank him among the gods; for the Egyptians are disposed to believe, that many divinities reigned in their country in succession, before it was governed by men, and before their kings were reckoned in a genealogical order, by Peirom after Peirom." There is an evident analogy between the term Peirom or Piromis, and Pharaoh, which last seems to be admitted as a title implying dignity, honour, elevation, and may be equivalent to our title of "Highness." As a farther proof of the intimate connection between the religious systems of Egypt and India, it may be remarked, that when Wilford described the great Egyptian pyramid to several very learned Brahmins, they declared it at once to have been a temple; and one of them asked if it had not a communication under ground with the river Cali? when Wilford answered that such a passage was mentioned as having existed, and that a well was at the present day to be seen, they unanimously agreed that it was a place appropriated to the worship of Padma-devi, and that the supposed tomb was a trough, which, on certain festivals, her priests used to fill with the sacred water and lotos flowers. There are also, it seems, pyramids now at Benares, though on a small scale, with subterranean passages under them which are said to extend many miles. But the most remarkable circumstance in relation to the ancient systems of worship in Egypt and India, and the intimate union which subsisted between them, is the fact of a Sphinx's head, and a column with an unknown inscription, having been discovered early in the present century on the banks of the Hypanis or Kuban, in digging amid the ruins of an ancient and unknown city. We have already alluded, in some former articles, to the arguments of Ritter, in which he so satisfactorily demonstrates, out of the mere fragments of ancient historians, the gradual advances of an enlightened priesthood from India, through the vast regions of Scythia, by the Caspian Sea, and even into Greece and the countries of the west. The remains of ancient and long forgotten communities, which even at the present day attract the attention of the traveller in southern Russia, by the borders of the Jeusei, as well as those on the Kuban, and in other parts, are all so many indications of early civilization and refinement. This refinement proceeded from the east, from India. It flowed also in a different channel, from the same great reservoir, towards Egypt and Phœnicia; for it is deserving of remembrance, that the characters described on the column just mentioned, after having been compared with the Greek, Roman, Tartar, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and Chinese letters, and found to bear no resemblance whatever with any of them, were discovered to have a manifest and close similarity with the characters observed by Denon on several of the mummies of Egypt.—On the supposition that the Egyptians who persecuted Israel were different from that Egyptian race under which Jacob went down into that land, that is, were a race who had come in and who held the country by conquest, we obtain several important illustrations of holy writ. Of these, the one most deserving of attention is the following: If the persecutors of Israel in Egypt were of the same foreign race which had overrun Canaan, as we have strong historical facts to warrant us in believing, then that seemingly causeless and unprovoked cruelty which appears in commanding a total expulsion or extermination of them from Canaan, is completely explained. 1st. Because they were a foreign race, and had no right to the country they possessed, whereas the Israelites were a branch of the great family of Shem, and as such possessed a just claim to the land in question, being allied by blood to the old inhabitants. 2d. Because the Israelites were retaliating upon them the cruelties they had exercised on them in Egypt, as well as the barbarities they had inflicted upon the old Canaanites, the kindred, in fact, of the people of Israel. 3d. Because the religion which these conquerors had established in Canaan was of all most impure and licentious, and needed signal punishment. Hence we may explain why the Jews allowed many of the ancient inhabitants or old Canaanites, particularly in the coast of Tyre and Sidon, to remain unmolested; for they were ordered merely to extirpate the stranger race that had settled in the land: and hence too we may be able to understand the meaning of Deut. 22, c. 7, "Thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian, a genuine Egyptian, but his children may enter into the congregation of the Lord, in the third generation:" whereas a Hamite's descent was not overlooked under ten generations. We have said nothing in the course of these remarks respecting the theory of Jablonski, (Voc. Ægypt. p. 346.) who supposes the Israelites to have been that shepherd race which ruled for a time over Egypt, and Moses to have been one of the princes of this race, who closed the temples of Egypt, and was the same with the shepherd Philitis. These pages are no place for the dreams of the irreligious. The student is referred to Creuzer's Commentationes Herodotææ, vol. 1, p. 190, seq.]

PYRAMUS, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbid to marry, regularly received each other's addresses through the chink of a wall which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity, they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and besmeared with blood. Pyramus soon arrived, he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a white mulberry tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the colour of blood. *Ovid. PYRÉNÆI, a mountain, or a long ridge of high mountains, which separate Gaul from Spain, and extend from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean Sea. [The range is about 294 miles in length. These mountains are steep, of difficult access, and only passable at five places. 1st. From Languedoc to Catalonia. 2d. From Comminge into Arragon. 2d. at Taraffa. 4th. At Maya and Pampeluna in Navarre, and 5th. At Sebastian in Biscay, which is the easiest of all.] They received their name from Pyrene the daughter of Bebrycius, (vid. Pyrene,) or from the fire (πυρ) which once raged there for several days. This fire was originally kindled by shepherds, and so intense was the heat which it occasioned, that all the silver mines of the mountains were melted, and ran down in large rivulets. This account is deemed fabulous by Strabo and others. [Both etymologies are equally bad.] Diad. 5.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Ital. 3, v. 415.—Liv. 21, c. 60.—Plut. 4, c. 20.

PYRÉNÆUS, a king of Thrace, who during a shower of rain, gave shelter in his house to the nine muses, and attempted to offer them violence. The goddesses upon this took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings, threw himself down from the top of a tower, and was killed. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 274.

PYRÈNE, a daughter of Bebrycius, king of the southern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon. [To avoid the fury of her father, she fled to the northern part of the country, and passed the remainder of her days on the mountains, called from her Pyrenæi. vid. Pyrenæi.]

PYRGOTÈLES, a celebrated engraver on gems, in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the exclusive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lysippus was the only sculptor who was permitted to make statues of him. Plin. 37, c. 1.

PYRÒDES, a son of Cilix, said to be the first who discovered and applied to human purposes the fire concealed in flints. Plin. 7, c. 56.

PYRRHA, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, who married Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, who reigned in Thessaly. In her age all mankind were destroyed by a deluge, and she alone, with her husband, escaped from the general destruction, by saving themselves in a boat which Deucalion had made by his father's advice. When the waters had retired from the surface of the earth. Pyrrha, with her husband, went to the oracle of Themis, where they were directed, to repair the loss of mankind, to throw stones behind their backs. They obeyed, and the stones which Pyrrha threw were changed into women, and those of Deucalion into men. [vid. Deucalion.] Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protogenea, by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 350, &c.—Hygin. fab. 153.—*Apollon. PYRRHO, a philosopher of Elea, disciple to Anaxarchus, and originally a painter. [He abandoned his profession in early life, and became successively a disciple of Byson and of Anaxarchus. He accompanied the latter, in the train of Alexander, into India. Here he conversed with the Brachmans and Gymnosophists, imbibing from their doctrine whatever might seem favourable to his natural disposition towards doubting; a disposition which was cherished by his master, who had formerly been a disciple of a sceptical philosopher, Metrodorus of Chios.] He was in continual suspense of judgment, he doubted of every thing, never made any conclusions, and when he had carefully examined a subject, and investigated all its parts, he concluded by still doubting of its evidence. This manner of doubting in the philosopher has been called Pyrrhonism, and his disciples have received the appellation of sceptics, inquisitors, examiners, &c. He pretended to have acquired an uncommon dominion over opinion and passions. The former of these virtues he called ataraxia, and the latter metriopatheia; and so far did he carry his want of common feeling and sympathy, that he passed with unconcern near a ditch in which his master Anaxarchus had fallen, and where he nearly perished. He was once in a storm, and when all hopes were vanished, and destruction certain, the philosopher remained unconcerned; and while the rest of the crew were lost in lamentations, he plainly told them to look at a pig which was then feeding himself on board the vessel, exclaiming This is a true model for a wise man. As he showed so much indifference in every thing, and declared that life and death were the same thing, some of his disciples asked him, why he did not hurry himself out of the world; because, said he, there is no difference between life and death. When he walked in the streets he never looked behind or moved from the road for a chariot, even in its most rapid course; and, indeed, as some authors remark, this indifference for his safety often exposed him to the greatest and most imminent dangers, from which he was saved by the interference of his friends who followed him. [These statements respecting the ridiculous extreme to which Pyrrho carried this scepticism, must be regarded as mere calumnies of the dogmatists, if we pay any attention to the respect with which he is mentioned by ancient authors, or give any credit to the general history of his life.] He flourished B.C. 304, and died at the advanced age of 90. He left no writings behind him. His countrymen were so partial to him, that they raised statues to his memory, and exempted all the philosophers of Elis from taxes. [He was also invested by them with the office of high-priest. Pyrrho seems to have been indebted for his scepticism to the early acquaintance he formed with the atomic system of Democritus.] Diog. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 17.—*Aul. PYRRHUS, a son of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes, who received this name from the flame-colour of his hair. He was also called Neoptolemus, or new warrior, because he came to the Trojan war in the last year of the celebrated siege of the capital of Troas. [vid. Neoptolemus.]—A king of Epirus, descended from Achilles, by the side of his mother, and from Hercules by that of his father, and son of Æacides and Phthia. He was saved when an infant, by the fidelity of his servants, from the pursuits of the enemies of his father, who had been banished from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glautias, king of Illyricum, who educated him with great tenderness. Cassander, king of Macedonia, wished to dispatch him, as he had so much to dread from him; but Glautias not only refused to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army, and placed him on the throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after, the absence of Pyrrhus, to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glautias, raised new commotions. The monarch was expelled from his throne by Neoptolemus, who had usurped it after the death of Æacides; and being still without resources, he applied to his brother-in-law Demetrius for assistance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipsus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards passed into Egypt, where, by his marriage with Antigone the daughter of Berenice, he soon obtained a sufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was successful in the undertaking, but, to remove all causes of quarrel, he took the usurper to share with him the royalty, and some time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poison him. In the subsequent years of his reign, Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which disturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy, he marched against Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian soldiers fresh proofs of his valour and activity. By dissimulation he ingratiated himself in the minds of his enemy's subjects, and when Demetrius laboured under a momentary illness, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia, which, if not then successful, soon after rendered him master of the kingdom. This he shared with Lysimachus for seven months, till the jealousy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire. Pyrrhus was meditating new conquests, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to assist them against the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his passage across the Adriatic proved nearly fatal, and he reached the shores of Italy after the loss of the greatest part of his troops in a storm. At his entrance into Tarentum, B. C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and, by introducing the strictest discipline among their troops, to accustom them to bear fatigue and to despise dangers. In the first battle which he fought with the Romans he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, whose bulk and uncommon appearance astonished the Romans, and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused, and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them was to attack another Hydra. A second battle was fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valour so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favour of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants, who laboured under the yoke of Carthage, and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy. He left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa, but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness and showed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 30,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy, under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B. C. 274, ashamed of the enterprize, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character, by attacking Antigonus who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos, where the treachery of Aristeus invited him. The Argives desired him to retire, and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town, and might have made himself master of the place had he not retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody, and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile, and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off, and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the Christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends but his enemies have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great for a model, and in every thing he wished not only to imitate but to surpass him. In the art of war none were superior to him, he not only made it his study as a general, but he even wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army, and whatever he did was by principle and rule. His uncommon understanding and his penetration are also admired; but the general is severely censured, who has no sooner conquered a country than he looks for other victories, without regarding, or securing what he had already obtained, by measures and regulations honourable to himself, and advantageous to his subjects. The Romans passed great encomiums upon him, and Pyrrhus was no less struck with their magnanimity and valour; so much indeed, that he exclaimed, that if he had soldiers like the Romans, or if the Romans had him for a general, he would leave no corner of the earth unseen, and no nation unconquered. Pyrrhus married many wives, and all for political reasons; besides Antigone he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Pæonia. His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, to him who has the sharpest sword. Ælian Hist. An. 10.—Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 17, &c.—Liv. 13 and 14.—Horat. 3, od. 6.

PYTHAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. [Great uncertainty exists as to the year when this philosopher was born. Some, as for example, La Nauze, and Freret, make it to have been the first year of the 43d Olympiad. Bentley is in favour of the 4th year of the same Olympiad, Meiners contends for the 2d of the 49th, Dodwell for the 4th of the 52d. There is a difference of 63 years between the extremes of these dates. Some authors assert that all which can be stated with any degree of certainty is, that 75 or 85 years of the life of Pythagoras (for even the duration of his life is a subject of controversy) fall within the 142 years that elapsed between A. C. 608 and A. C. 466. Visconti gives the preference to Eusebius, who, in fixing the death of Pythagoras in the 496th A. C. expresses his doubts respecting the advanced age to which the philosopher is said to have attained.] His father Mnesarchus was a person of distinction, and, therefore, the son received that education which was most calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body. Like his contemporaries, he was early made acquainted with poetry and music; eloquence and astronomy became his private studies, and in gymnastic exercises he often bore off the palm for strength and dexterity. He first made himself known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wrestling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his person, and the brilliancy of his understanding, he retired into the east. In Egypt and Chaldaea he gained the confidence of the priests, and learned from them the artful policy, and the symbolic writings, by which they governed the princes as well as the people, and, after he had spent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from ancient tradition concerning the nature of the gods and the immortality of the soul, Pythagoras re-visited his native island. [Much is said by Iamblicus and other later biographers, of Pythagoras's early journey into Ionia, and his visits to Thales and Anaximander; but we find no ancient record of his journey, nor any traces of its effects on his doctrine, which differs essentially from that of the Ionic school. On his way to Egypt, Iamblicus asserts that he visited Phœnicia, and conversed with the descendants of Mochus, and other priests of that count.ÿ, and was initiated into their peculiar mysteries. And it may seem not entirely improbable that he might wish to be farther acquainted with the Phœnician philosophy, of which he had doubtless heard a general report from his father and other merchants who traded to that coast. But it is certainly a fiction of the Alexandrian school that Py-thagoras received his doctrine of numbers from the Phœnicians; for their knowledge of numbers extended no farther than to the practical science of arithmetic. In Egypt, Pythagoras was introduced, by the recommendation of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, to Amasis, king of Egypt, a great patron of learned men, particularly those of Greece, that he might the more easily obtain access to the colleges of the priests. The king himself could scarcely, with all his authority, prevail upon the priests to admit a stranger to the knowledge of their sacred mysteries. The college of Heliopolis, to whom the king's instructions were sent, referred Pythagoras to the college of Memphis, as of greater antiquity; from Memphis he was dismissed, under the same pretence, to Thebes. The Theban priests, not daring to reject the royal mandate, yet loth to comply with it, prescribed Pythagoras many severe and troublesome preliminary ceremonies, among which was that of circumcision, hoping thereby to discourage him from prosecuting his design. Pythagoras, however, executed all their injunctions with such wonderful patience and perseverance, that he obtained their entire confidence, and was instructed in their most recondite doctrines. He passed twenty-two years in Egypt. During this time he made himself perfectly master of the three kinds of writing which were used in that country, the epistolary, the hieroglyphic, and the symbolical; and, having obtained access to their most learned men, in every celebrated college of priests, he became intimately conversant with their ancient records, and gained an accurate knowledge of their doctrine concerning the origin of things, with their astronomy and geometry, and, in short, with Egyptian learning in its whole extent. Many writers who flourished after the commencement of the Christian era, both Pagan and Christian, have related that Pythagoras, immediately after he left Egypt, visited the Persian and Chaldaean Magi, and travelled so far into the east as to converse with the Indian Gymnosophists. The occasion of this journey is thus related by Iamblicus: "After spending twenty-two years in Egypt, he was conveyed by the victorious army of Cambyses, among a numerous train of captives, to Babylon, where he made himself perfectly acquainted with the learning and philosophy of the east; and, after the expiration of 12 years, when he was in the 60th year of his age, he returned to Samos." Cicero, Eusebius, Lactantius, and Valerius Maximus, though they say nothing of the captivity, agree that he visited the Persian Magi. Some have even maintained that in this journey he attended upon the instructions of the celebrated Zoroaster, while others, who have placed the life of Zoroaster in an earlier period than that of Pythagoras, have asserted that the latter conversed with certain Jewish priests, who were at that time in captivity at Babylon, and by this means became intimately acquainted with the Jewish laws and customs. After all, however, there is great reason to suspect the truth of the whole narrative of Pythagoras's journey into the east; for the relation is encumbered with inextricable chronological difficulties. The whole proof of the reality of this expedition rests either upon the evidence of certain Alexandrian Platonists, who were desirous of exalting as much as possible the reputation of those ancient philosophers to whom they looked back as the first oracles of wisdom, or upon that of certain Jewish and Christian writers, who were willing to credit every tale which might seem to render it probable that the Pythagorean doctrine was derived from the Oriental philosophers, and ultimately from the Hebrew Scriptures. It seems, therefore, on the whole, most reasonable to look upon the story of his eastern journey as a mere fiction, and to conclude that Pythagoras never passed over from Egypt to the east, but returned thence immediately to Samos. Pythagoras, on his return to his native island, was desirous that his fellow-citizens should reap the benefit of his travels and studies; and, for this purpose, attempted to institute a school for their instruction in the elements of science, but chose to adopt the Egyptian mode of teaching, and communicate his doctrines under a symbolical form. His attempt was unsuccessful. He then visited in succession Delos, Crete, Sparta, Elis, (being present at the Olympic games celebrated in the latter district), and finally Phlius, in Achaia, the residence of Leon, king of the Phliasiens. Here he first assumed the appellation of philosopher. Cicero ascribes the invention of this term to Pythagoras. It seems, according to this writer, that Leon, charmed with the ingenuity and eloquence with which he discoursed on various topics, asked him in what art he principally excelled: to which Pythagoras replied that he did not profess himself master of any art, but that he was a philosopher. Leon, struck with the novelty of the term, asked Pythagoras who were philosophers, and wherein they differed from other men? Pythagoras replied, that, as in the public games, whilst some are contending for glory, and others are buying and selling in pursuit of gain, there is always a third class who attend merely as spectators; so, in human life, amidst the various characters of men, there is a select number, who, despising all other pursuits, assiduously apply themselves to the study of nature, and the search after wisdom; these, added Pythagoras, are the persons whom I denominate philosophers. On his return to Samos, he made a second attempt to institute among his countrymen a school of philosophy. He not only opened a public place of instruction, but also provided himself with a secret cave, into which he retired with his intimate friends and professed disciples, and here, not without a wonderful parade of mystery, gave them daily instruction in the more abstruse parts of philosophy. These arts, which unquestionably rank this celebrated philosopher among impostors, proved successful, and procured him a great multitude of followers. At last, however, whether the Samians began to detect his frauds, or to be apprehensive of his increasing popularity, or whether Pythagoras wished to escape the tyranny of the governor Syllon, the brother of Polycrates, he suddenly left Samos, and passing over into Italy, attempted to open his school among the colonies of Magna Græcia. It appears probable, that when Pythagoras arrived in this country, in order to obtain credit with the populace, he pretended to possess the power of working miracles, and practised many arts of imposture.] At the city of Crotona he founded a sect which has received the name of the Italian, and he soon saw himself surrounded by a great number of pupils, which the recommendation of his mental, as well as his personal accomplishments had procured. His skill in music and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics and of natural philosophy, gained him friends and admirers, and amidst the voluptuousness that prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian sage found his instructions respected and his approbation courted: the most debauched and effeminate were pleased with the elegance and the graceful delivery of the philosopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly pursuits. These animated harangues were attended with rapid success, and a reformation soon took place in the morals and the lives of the people of Crotona. [It is asserted, that in Crotona there were not less than 600 persons, (some say 2000,) who were prevailed on to submit to the strict discipline which he required, and to throw their effects into a common stock for the benefit of the whole fraternity.] The females were exhorted to become modest, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from their pursuits of pleasure, and instantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that submissive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to spend their time in amassing money, but to improve their understanding, and to seek that peace and those comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy alone can produce. The sober and religious behaviour of the philosopher strongly recommended the necessity and importance of these precepts. [Pythagoras did not confine the influence of his philosophy to Crotona. He taught his doctrine in many other cities of Magna Græcia with so much energy and effect, that he established a large and extensive interest through the country, and obtained from his followers a degree of respect little short of adoration.] Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aspect, his voice was harmonious, his eloquence persuasive, and the reputation he had acquired by his distant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour ; he lived upon the purest and most innocent food, he clothed himself like the priests of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications and regular offerings, he seemed to be superior to the rest of mankind in sanctity. These artful measures united to render him an object not only of reverence, but of imitation. [His whole manner of life confirms the opinion, that one of his chief objects was to impose upon the credulity of an ignorant and superstitious people. Clothed in a long white robe, with a flowing beard, and, as some relate, with a golden crown on his head, he preserved among the people, and in the presence of his disciples, a commanding gravity and majesty of aspect. He made use of music to promote the tranquillity of his mind, frequently singing for this purpose hymns of Thales, Hesiod, and Homer. He had such an entire command over himself that he was never seen to express, in his countenance, grief, joy, or anger. He refrained from animal food, and confined himself to a frugal vegetable diet. By this artificial demeanour, Pythagoras passed himself off upon the vulgar as a being of an order superior to the common condition of humanity, and persuaded them that he had received his doctrine from heaven.] To set himself at a greater distance from his pupils, a number of years was required to try their various dispositions; the most talkative were not permitted to speak in the presence of their master before they had been his auditors for five years, and those who possessed a natural taciturnity were allowed to speak after a probation of two years. [Before any one could be admitted into this fraternity, Pythagoras examined his features and external appearance; enquired in what manner he had been accustomed to behave towards his parents and friends; remarked his manner of conversing, laughing, and keeping silence; and observed what passions he was most inclined to indulge, with what kind of company he chose to associate, how he passed his leisure moments, and what incidents appeared to excite in him the strongest emotions of joy or sorrow. From these and other circumstances, Pythagoras formed an accurate judgment of the qualifications of the candidate; and he admitted no one into his society till he was fully persuaded of his capacity of becoming a true philosopher. Upon the first probationary admission the fortitude and self-command of the candidate was put to the trial by a long course of severe abstinence and rigorous exercise. The injunction of silence has already been alluded to. This silence, or εχρησθια, as it was termed, is not to be confounded with that sacred reserve with which all the disciples of Pythagoras were bound, upon oath, to receive the doctrines of their master, that they might, from no inducement whatsoever, suffer them to pass beyond the limits of their sect. Pythagoras, like all other philosophers, had his exoteric, or public, and his esoteric, or private, doctrines. The restraint which he put upon the words of his pupils, by enjoining silence for so long a time, was certainly in one point of view, a very judicious expedient, as it restrained impertinent curiosity, and prevented every inconvenience of contradiction. Accordingly we find, that his disciples silenced all doubts, and refuted all objections, by appealing to his authority. Αυτος εφα, ipse dixit, decided every dispute. Nor was this preparatory discipline deemed sufficiently severe, without adding, during the years of initiation, an entire prohibition of seeing their master, or hearing his lectures, except from behind a curtain. And even this privilege was too great to be commonly allowed; for in this stage of tuition they were usually instructed by some inferior preceptor, who barely recited the doctrine of Pythagoras, without assigning the reasonings or demonstrations on which they were founded, and required the obedient pupil to receive them as unquestionable truths, upon their master's word. Those who had sufficient perseverance to pass these several steps of probation, were at last admitted among the Esoterics, and allowed to see and hear Pythagoras behind the curtain. But if it happened that any one, through impatience of such rigid discipline, chose to withdraw from the society before the expiration of the term of trial, he was dismissed with a share of the common stock, the double of that which he had advanced; a tomb was erected for him as for a dead man; and he was to be as much forgotten by the brethren as if he had been actually dead. It was the peculiar privilege of the Esoterics, to receive a full explanation of the whole doctrine of Pythagoras; which to others was delivered in brief precepts and dogmas, under the concealment of symbols. They were also permitted to take minutes of their master's lectures, in writing, and to propose questions and offer remarks upon every subject of discourse. These disciples were particularly distinguished by the appellation of the Pythagoreans; they were also called the Mathematicians, from the studies upon which they entered immediately after their initiation. After they had made a sufficient progress in geometrical science, they were conducted to the study of nature, the investigation of primary principles, and the knowledge of God. Those who pursued these sublime speculations were called Theorists; and such as more particularly devoted themselves to Theology were styled θεωρητικοι, Religious. Others, according to their respective abilities and inclinations, were engaged in the study of morals, economics, and policy; and were afterwards employed in managing the affairs of the fraternity, or sent into the cities of Greece, to instruct them in the principles of government, or assist them in the institution of laws.] The Samian philosopher was the first who supported the doctrine of metemp- psychosis, or transmigration of the soul into different bodies, and those notions he seemed to have imbibed among the priests of Egypt, or in the solitary retreats of the Brachmans. More strenuously to support his chimerical system, he declared he recollected the different bodies his soul had animated before that of the son of Mnesarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides, the son of Mercury, to have assisted the Greeks during the Trojan war in the character of Euphorbus, [vid. Euphorbus.] to have been Hermotimus, afterwards a fisherman, and last of all Pythagoras. [The doctrine of the metempsychosis was the cause of the Pythagorean abstaining from animal food, and of the exclusion of animal sacrifices from their religious ceremonies. This doctrine Pythagoras very probably learned in Egypt. Nor is there any sufficient reason for understanding it, as some have done, symbolically. The precept prohibiting the use of beans was probably rather diætic, than physical or moral: it is, however, one of those mysteries which the ancient Pythagoreans never disclosed, and which modern ingenuity has in vain attempted to discover.] In his theological system Pythagoras supported that the universe was created from a shapeless heap of passive matter by the hands of a powerful being, who himself was the mover and soul of the world, and of whose substance the souls of mankind were a portion. He considered numbers as the principles of every thing, and perceived in the universe, regularity, correspondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the Creator. [The most probable explanation of the Pythagorean doctrine of numbers is, that they were used as symbolical or emblematical representations of the first principles and forms of nature, and particularly of those eternal and immutable essences, to which Plato afterwards gave the appellation of Ideas. Not being able, or not choosing, to explain in simple language the abstract notions of principles and forms, Pythagoras seems to have made use of numbers as geometers make use of diagrams, to assist the conceptions of scholars. More particularly, conceiving some analogy between numbers and the intelligent forms which subsist in the Divine Mind, he made the former a symbol of the latter. As numbers proceed from unity, or the Monad, as a simple root, whence they branch out into various combinations, and assume new properties in their progress, so he conceived the different forms of nature to recede, at different distances, from their common source, the pure and simple essence of Deity, and at every degree of distance to assume certain properties in some measure analogous to those of numbers; and hence he concluded that the origin of things, their emanation from the first being, and their subsequent progression through various orders, if not capable of a perfectly clear explanation, might, however, be illustrated by symbols and resemblances borrowed from numbers.]

According to some writers, the Pythagorean Monad denotes the active principle in nature, or God; the Duad, the passive principle, or matter; the Triad, the world formed by the union of the two former; and the Tetractys, the perfection of nature. Every attempt, however, to unfold the nature of this last mysterious number, has hitherto been unsuccessful. Next to numbers, music had the chief place in the preparatory exercises of the Pythagorean school, by means of which the mind was to be raised above the dominion of passion, and inured to contemplation. Pythagoras considered music not only as an art to be judged of by the ear, but as a science to be reduced to mathematical principles and proportions. The musical chords are said to have been discovered by him in the following manner: As he was one day reflecting on this subject, happening to pass by a smith's forge, where several men were successively striking with their hammers a piece of heated iron upon an anvil, he remarked that all the sounds produced by their strokes were harmonious except one. The sounds, which he observed to be chords, were the octave, the fifth, and the third; but that sound which he perceived to lie between the third and the fifth he found to be discordant. Going into the workshop, he observed that the diversity of sounds arose, not from the forms of the hammers, nor from the force with which they were struck, nor from the position of the iron, but merely from the difference of weight in the hammers. Taking, therefore, the exact weight of the several hammers, he went home, and suspended four strings of the same substance, length, and thickness, and twisted in the same degree, and hung a weight at the lower end of each, respectively, equal to the weight of the hammers; upon striking the strings, he found that the musical chords of the strings corresponded with those of the hammers. Hence, it is said, that he proceeded to form a musical scale, and to construct stringed instruments. His scale was, after his death, engraved on brass, and preserved in the temple of Juno at Samos. Pythagoras conceived that the celestial spheres in which the planets move, striking upon the ether through which they pass, must produce a sound, and that this sound must vary, according to the diversity of their magnitude, velocity, and relative distance. Taking it for granted that every thing respecting the heavenly bodies is adjusted with perfect regularity, he farther imagined, that all the circumstances necessary to render the sounds produced by their motions harmonious, were fixed in such exact proportions, that the most perfect harmony was produced by their revolutions. This fanciful doctrine respecting the music of the spheres gave rise to the names which Pythagoras applied to musical tones. The last note in the musical octave he called Hypate (ὑπάτη), because he supposed the sphere of Saturn, the highest planet, to give the deepest tone, and the highest note he called Neate (νιαιτη), from the sphere of the moon, which, being the lowest or nearest the earth, he imagined produced the shrillest sound. In like manner of the rest. It was said of Pythagoras by his followers, who hesitated at no assertion, however improbable, which might seem to exalt their master's fame, that he was the only mortal so far favoured by the gods as to have been permitted to hear the celestial music of the spheres.] In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind, propensities common to us with the brute creation; but besides these, and the passions of avarice and ambition, he discovered the noble seeds of virtue, and supported that the most ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleasure. The thoughts of the past he considered as always present to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was disturbed by consciousness of guilt or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philosopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labour, in study, in exercise, and repose; and the philosopher maintained his well known and important maxim, that many things, especially love, are best learned late. In a more advanced age, the adult was desired to behave with caution, spirit, and patriotism, and to remember that the community and civil society demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From lessons like these, the Pythagoreans were strictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review the actions, not only of the present, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion, they early repaired to the most solitary places of the mountains, and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and conversed with themselves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreshed the body with light and frugal aliments. Their conversation was of the most innocent nature; political or philosophic subjects were discussed with propriety, but without warmth; and, after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was spent with the same religious ceremony as the morning, in a strict and impartial self-examination. From such regularity nothing but the most salutary consequences could arise, and it will not appear wonderful that the disciples of Pythagoras were so much respected and admired as legislators, and imitated for their constancy, friendship, and humanity. The authors that lived in, and after the age of Alexander, have rather tarnished than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean school, and they have obscured his fame by attributing to him actions which were dissonant with his character as a man and a moralist. To give more weight to his exhortations, as some writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a subterraneous cave, where his mother sent him intelligence of every thing which happened during his absence. After a certain number of months he again re-appeared on the earth with a grim and ghastly countenance, and declared, in the assembly of the people, that he was returned from hell. From similar exaggerations, it has been asserted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleased on a looking-glass, and that, by setting it opposite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glass became legible on the moon's disc. They also support, that, by some magical words, he tamed a bear, stopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the same day and at the same instant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c. The time and the place of the death of this great philosopher are unknown; yet many suppose that he died at Metapontum about 497 years before Christ. [Pythagoras, it seems, not content with instructing his select disciples in the speculative doctrines of philosophy, discovered on many occasions a strong propensity towards political innovations. Not only at Crotona, but at Metapontum, Rhegium, Agrigentum, and many other places, he obtained great influence over the people, and employed it in urging them to a strenuous assertion of their rights against the encroachments of their tyrannical governors. These attempts, together with the singularities of the school, excited a general spirit of jealousy, and raised a powerful opposition against him. At the head of this opposition was Cylo, a man of wealth and distinction at Crotona, who had been refused admission into the Pythagorean school, and whose temper was too haughty to brook such an indignity. A large body of Pythagoreans having assembled at the house of Milo, one of their chief friends, the opposite party surrounded the house and set it on fire. About forty persons perished in the flames. Archyppus and Lysis, two natives of Tarentum, alone escaped. Pythagoras, being present in Crotona when this fatal attack was made upon his school, and incapable of resisting the torrent of jealousy and enmity which rushed upon him, was obliged to retire to Metapontum. Here he found himself still surrounded by enemies, and was obliged to take refuge in the temple of the Muses. Here, not being able to obtain from his friends the necessary supply of food, he perished of hunger. This is the most probable account of the manner of his death. According to the Chronicon of Eusebius, he died in the 3d year of the 68th Olympiad, aged, according to the most correct accounts, about 80 years. After his death his disciples paid a superstitious regard to his memory. They erected statues in honour of him, converted his house in Crotona into a temple of Ceres and appealed to him as a divinity, swearing by his name.] Succeeding ages likewise acknowledged his merits; and when the Romans, A. U. C. 411, were commanded by the oracle of Delphi, to erect a statue to the bravest and wisest of the Greeks, the distinguished honour was conferred on Alcibiades and Pythagoras. Pythagoras had a daughter called Damo. There is now extant a poetical composition ascribed to the philosopher, and called the golden verses of Pythagoras, which contain the greatest part of his doctrines and moral precepts: but many suppose that it is a supposititious composition. [Perhaps they are to be ascribed to Epicharmus or Empedocles. They may be considered as containing a brief summary of his popular doctrines.] Pythagoras distinguished himself also by his discoveries in geometry, astronomy, and mathematics, and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonstration of the 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid's elements, about the square of the hypotenuse. It is said, that he was so elated after making the discovery, that he made an offering of a hecatomb to the gods; but the sacrifice was undoubtedly of small oxen, made with wax, as the philosopher was ever an enemy to shedding the blood of all animals. His system of the universe, in which he placed the sun in the centre, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed chimerical and improbable, till the deep inquiries and the philosophy of the 16th century proved it, by the most accurate calculations, to be true and incontestible. [He appears to have learned this system in Egypt.] Diogenes, Porphyry, Iamblicus, and others have written an account of his life, but with more erudition, perhaps, than veracity. *Cic. de Nat. PYTHEAS, a native of Massilia, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, mathematics, philosophy, and geography. He also distinguished himself by his travels, and, with a mind that wished to seek information in every corner of the earth, he advanced far into the northern seas, and discovered the island of Thule, and entered that sea which is now called the Baltic. His discoveries in astronomy and geography were ingenious; indeed, modern navigators have found it expedient to justify and accede to his conclusions. He was the first who established a distinction of climate by the length of days and nights. He wrote different treatises in Greek, which have been lost, though some of them were extant in the beginning of the fifth century. Pytheas lived, according to some, in the age of Aristotle. [All that remains of the writings of Pytheas consists of some, detached fragments in Strabo, Pliny, and a few other writers. Marcianus, the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, and Geminus Rhodius, quote merely the titles of his works. According to the two first, he wrote a Periplus and Periodus of the earth, and, according to the last, a book on the Ocean, if this be not a portion of the entire work. Eratosthenes grounded his system in a great degree on the observations made by Pytheas.] Strab. 2, &c.—Plin. 37.—An Athenian rhetorician, in the age of Demosthenes, who distinguished himself by his intrigues, rapacity, and his opposition to the measures of Demosthenes, of whom he observed, that his orations smelt of the lamp. His orations were devoid of elegance, harsh, unconnected, and diffuse, and from this circumstance he has not been ranked among the orators of Athens. Ælian. V. PYTHEUS, a Lydian, famous for his riches in the age of Xerxes. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army, when he was marching on his expedition against Greece, and offered him to defray the expenses of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promised to give him whatever he should require. Pytheus asked him to dismiss his son from the expedition: upon which the monarch ordered the young man to be cut in two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Plut. de mul. virt.—Herodot.

PYTHIA, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the answer of the god to such as came to consult the oracle, and was supposed to be suddenly inspired by the sulphureous vapours which issued from the hole of a subterraneous cavity within the temple, over which she sat on a three-legged stool, called a tripod. In the stool was a small aperture, through which the vapour was exhaled by the priestess, and, at this divine inspiration, her eyes suddenly sparkled, her hair stood on end, and a shivering ran over all her body. In this convulsive state she spoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries, and her articulations were taken down by the priest, and set in order. Sometimes the spirit of inspiration was more gentle, and not always violent; yet Plutarch mentions one of the priestesses who was thrown into such an excessive fury, that not only those that consulted the oracle, but also the priests that conducted her to the sacred tripod, and attended her during the inspiration, were terrified and forsook the temple; and so violent was the fit, that she continued for some days in the most agonizing situation, and at last died. The Pythia, before she placed herself on the tripod, used to wash her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Castalis, at the foot of Mount Parnassus. She also shook a laurel tree that grew near the place, and sometimes ate the leaves with which she crowned herself. The priestess was originally a virgin, but the institution was changed when Echechrates, a Thessalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of fifty were permitted to enter upon that sacred office. They always appeared dressed in the garments of virgins to intimate their purity and modesty, and they were solemnly bound to observe the strictest laws of temperance and chastity, that neither phantastical dresses nor lascivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion, or the sanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, besides subordinate priests, and afterwards two were chosen, and sometimes more. The most celebrated of all these is Pheonoe, who is supposed by some to have been the first who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verses, a custom which was some time after discontinued. The Pythia was consulted only one month in the year, about the spring. It was always required that those who consulted the oracle should make large presents to Apollo, and from thence arose the opulence, splendour, and the magnificence of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices also were offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavourable, the priestess refused to give an answer. There were generally five priests who assisted at the offering of the sacrifices, and there was also another who attended the Pythia, and assisted her in receiving the oracle. [*vid. They were first instituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himself, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the serpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were first established by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or lastly, by the council of the Amphictyons, B. C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, on the second year of every Olympiad, according to the number of the Parnassian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themselves were originally among the combatants, and, according to some authors, the first prizes were won by Pollux, in boxing; Castor, in horse-racing; Hercules, in the pancratium; Zethus, in fighting with the armour; Calais, in running; Telamon, in wrestling; and Peleus, in throwing the quoit. These illustrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himself, who was present, with crowns and laurel. Some, however, observe that it was nothing but a musical contention, in which he who sung best the praises of Apollo obtained the prize, which was presents of gold and silver, which was afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm tree, or of beech leaves. It is said that Hesiod was refused admission to these games, because he was not able to play upon the harp, which was required of all such as entered the lists. The songs which were sung were called πυθιακοι νομοι, the Pythian modes, divided into five parts, which contained a fight and victory of Apollo over Python; ανικησεις, the preparation for the fight; εμπειρα, the first attempt; κατακλεισμος, taking breath and collecting courage; ιαρβοι και δακτυλοι, the insulting sarcasms of the god over his vanquished enemy; συστριγγες, in imitation of the hisses of the serpent; just as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was also introduced; and in the 8th Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who presided over the games, increased the number of musical instruments by the addition of a flute, but, as it was more peculiarly used in funeral songs and lamentations, it was soon rejected as unfit for merriment, and the festivals which represented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered serpent. The Romans, according to some, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinarenses ludi. Paus. 10, c. 13 and 37.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 447.—Plin. 7.—Liv. 25.

ΠΥΘΙΑΣ, a Pythagorean philosopher, intimate with Damon. (vid. Phintias.)—A road which led from Thessaly to Tempe. Ælian.

ΠΥΘΙΩΣ, a Syracusan, who defrauded Caninius, a Roman knight, to whom he had sold his gardens, &c. Cic. de Off. 3, c. 14.—A surname of Apollo, which he had received for his having conquered the serpent Python, or because he was worshipped at Delphi; called also Pytho. Macrob. 1, sat. 17.—Proper. 2, el. 23, v. 16.

ΠΥΘΟ, the ancient name of the town of Delphi, which it received απο του πυθεισθαι, because the serpent which Apollo killed rotted there. It was also called Parnassia Nape. (vid. Delphi.)

ΠΥΘΟΚΛΕΣ, an Athenian descended from Aratus. It is said, that on his account, and for his instruction, Plutarch wrote the life of Aratus.

ΠΥΘΩΝ, a native of Byzantium, in the age of Philip of Macedonia. He was a great favourite of the monarch, who sent him to Thebes, when that city, at the instigation of Demosthenes, was going to take arms against Philip. Plut. in Dem.—Diod.—A celebrated serpent, sprung from the mud and stagnated waters which remained on the surface of the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some, however, suppose that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona, who was then pregnant by Jupiter. Latona escaped his fury by means of her lover, who changed her into a quail during the remaining months of her pregnancy, and afterwards restored her to her original shape in the island of Delos, where she gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Apollo, as soon as he was born, attacked the monster and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games. [Strabo says, that Python was no other than a famous villain, whom Apollo destroyed. Dickinson, in his "Delphi Phœnicizantes," maintains the Python of the Greeks to be the Typhon of the Phœnicians; and the Typhon of the Phœnicians to be the Og of Scripture, while he will have Apollo, who slew it, to have been Joshua. In truth, however, the slaying of Python by Apollo seems to be symbolical of one system of religion, probably that of the Sun, supplanting another and more ancient one.] Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 7, l. 10, c. 6.—Hygin.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 438, &c.—Lucan. 3, v. 134.

QU

QUADI, an ancient nation of Germany, near the country of the Marcomanni, on the borders of the Danube, in modern Moravia. They rendered themselves celebrated by their opposition to the Romans, by whom they were often defeated, though not totally subdued. [The original seat of the Quadi seems to have been on the eastern banks of the Danube towards the Theis, as far as the settlements of the Getæ. The incursions of the Jazyges and the Getæ compelled them to migrate to the west.] Tacit. in Germ. 42 and 43. An. 2, c. 63.

QUADRATUS, a surname given to Mercury, because some of his statues were square. The number 4, according to Plutarch, was sacred to Mercury, because he was born on the 4th day of the month. Plut. in Sympos. 9.

QUADRIFRONS, or QUADRICEPS, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raised by L. Catulus.

QUÆSTORES, two officers at Rome, first created A. U. C. 269. [There are two opinions respecting the origin of the Quæstorian office. According to the first, the institution of Quæstors seems to have been nearly as ancient as the city itself. They were first appointed by the kings, according to Tacitus, and then by the consuls to the year 307, when they began to be elected by the people at the Comitia Tributa. Others say that two quæstors were chosen by the people from among the patricians, soon after the expulsion of the Tarquins, to take care of the treasury, according to a law passed by Valerius Poplicola.] They received their name, a quærendo, because they collected the revenues of the state, and had the total management of the public treasury. The quæstorship was the first office which could be had in the state. It was requisite that the candidates should be 24 or 25 years of age, or, according to some, 27. [The authority of Dio Cassius favours 25 years of age as the time for first enjoying this office, and that of Polybius, 27 years. In Cicero's time, however, it appears to have been 31.] In the year 332 U. C. two more were added to the others, to attend the consuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, and sell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conquest. These were called Peregrini, whilst the others, whose employment was in the city, received the name of Urbani.

PYTHONISSA, a name given to the priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi. She is more generally called Pythia. (vid. Pythia.) The word Pythianissa was commonly applied to women who attempted to explain futurity.

QU

When the Romans were masters of all Italy, four more were created, A. U. C. 498, to attend the pro-consuls and pro-prætors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and customs which each particular district owed to the republic. They were called Provinciades. Sylla the dictator created 20 quæstors, and J. Cæsar 40, to fill up the vacant seats in the senate; from whence it is evident that the quæstors ranked as senators in the senate. The quæstors were always appointed by the senate at Rome, and if any person was appointed to the quæstorship without their permission he was only called Proquæstor. The quæstores urbani were apparently of more consequence than the rest, the treasury was intrusted to their care, they kept an account of all receipts and disbursements, and the Roman eagles or ensigns were always in their possession when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed to tell them, upon his oath, that he had given a just account of the number of the slain on both sides, and that he had been saluted imperator by the soldiers, a title which every commander generally received from his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the senate. The city quæstors had also the care of the ambassadors, they lodged and received them. [They took care also of the funerals of those who were buried at the public expense. Augustus took from them the charge of the treasury, and gave it to the prætors, or to those who had been prætors, but Claudius restored it to the quæstors. Afterwards præfects of the treasury seem to have been appointed. Augustus, as a compensation for depriving them of the care of the treasury, allowed the quæstors the charge of the public records, which the ædiles had formerly exercised. He introduced also a kind of quæstors, called Quæstores Candidati, who used to carry the messages of the emperor to the senate, and who were called Candidati because they sued for higher preferment, which by the interest of the emperor they were sure to obtain. Constantine instituted a new kind of quæstors, called Quæstores Palatii, who were much the same with what we call Chancellors.] The tent of the quæstor in the camp was called quæstorium. It stood near that of the general. Varro de L. L. 4.—Liv. 4, c. 43.—Dio. 43.

QUERQUETULANUS, a name given to Mount

Cœlius at Rome, from the oaks which grew there. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 65.

QUIËTIS FANUM, a temple without the walls of the city of Rome. Quies was the goddess of rest. Her temple was situate near the Colline gate. Liv. 4, c. 4.—August. de Civ. D. 4, c. 16.

QUINTIA PRATA. vid. Quintia.

QUINCTIUS T. a Roman consul who gained some victories over the Æqui and the Volsci, and obtained a triumph for subduing Præneste.—A Roman celebrated for his frugality. [vid. Cincinnatus.]—Hirpinus. vid. Hirpinus.

QUINDECIMVIRI, an order of priests whom Tarquin the Proud appointed to take care of the Sibylline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increased to ten, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. [vid. Decemviri and Duumviri.]

QUINQUATRIA, a festival in honour of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The first day sacrifices and oblations were presented, but, however, without the effusion of blood. On the second, third, and fourth days, shows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a solemn procession through the streets of the city. On the days of the celebration, scholars obtained holidays, and it was usual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wisdom, which the goddess patronized; and on their return to school, they presented their master with a gift which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the same as the Panathenæa of the Greeks. Plays were also acted, and disputations were held on subjects of literature. They received their name from the five days which were devoted for their celebration.

QUINQUENNIALES LUDI, games celebrated by the Chians in honour of Homer every fifth year. There were also some games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the same as the Actian games. vid. Actia.

QUINTIA PRATA, a place on the borders of the Tiber near Rome, which had been cultivated by the great Cincinnatus. Liv. 3, c. 26.

QUINTILIĀNUS, Marcus Fabius, a celebrated rhetorician, born about the year 42 of the Christian era, in the reign of the emperor Claudius. [He is supposed to have been descended from a family originally Spanish, but that his father or grandfather had settled at Rome. The place of his birth is not clearly ascertained, but it seems certain that he was educated at the capital, where he studied rhetoric under Domitius Afer, a celebrated orator. The opinion of some that he was born at Calaguris in Spain, is entitled to little if any credit. Some have styled him Quintilianus, and this orthography was first adopted by Gibson. All the manuscripts, however, and the best editions give the form Quintiliānus.] He opened a school of rhetoric at Rome, and was the first who obtained a salary from the state as being a public teacher. After he had remained twenty years in this laborious employment and obtained the merited applause of the most illustrious Romans, not only as a preceptor, but as a pleader at the bar, Quintilian, by the permission of the emperor Domitian, retired to enjoy the fruits of his labours and industry. In his retirement he assiduously dedicated his time to the study of literature, and wrote a treatise on the causes of the corruption of eloquence. [vid. Tacitus, where some remarks will be offered in favour of the opinion which ascribes this treatise to Tacitus, and not to Quintilian.] Some time after, at the pressing solicitations of his friends, he wrote his institutions oratoriae, the most perfect and complete system of oratory extant. It is divided into 12 books, in which the author explains from observations, as well as from experience, what can constitute a good and perfect orator, and in this he not only mentions the pursuits and the employments of the rhetorician, but he also speaks of his education, and begins with the attention which ought to be shown him even in the cradle. [In this work Quintilian states the results of long experience and deep reflection. He gives signal proofs in it of an excellent judgment, of a refined critical spirit, of a pure taste, and of extensive and varied reading. This work is preferable to all that we have from Cicero respecting the theory of eloquence. Quintilian has profited by the precepts of this great master, but he does not stop where the other stops: he adds to his labours the observations which a long course of practical experience had suggested. He has formed his style upon that of Cicero, and he writes with an elegance which would entitle him to a rank by the side of the purest models of the Augustan age, if certain obscure expressions, and some specimens of affected phraseology did not betray the writer of a later age. His tenth book, where he speaks of the Greek and Roman authors of the higher class, is one of the most instructive, and of great importance in relation to the history of ancient literature.] He was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian destined for his successors on the throne, but the pleasure which the rhetorician received from the favours and the attention of the emperor, and from the success which his writings met in the world, was embittered by the loss of his wife and of his two sons. It is said that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indigence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil, Pliny the younger. He died A. D. 95. His institutions were discovered in the 1415th year of the Christian era, in an old tower of a monastery at St. Gal, by Poggio Bracciolini, a native of Florence. [A second manuscript was discovered by Arretinus in Italy, but in a very defective state.] The best editions of Quintilian are those of Gesner, 4to. Gotting. 1738; of L. Bat. 3vo. cum notis variorum, 1665; of

Gibson, 4to. Oxon. 1693; that of Rollin, re-published in 8vo. London, 1792; [and that of Spalding, Lips. 1798-1816, 4 vols. 8vo.]

QUINTILLUS, M. Aurelius Claudius, a brother of Claudius who proclaimed himself emperor, and 17 days after destroyed himself by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching against him, about the 270th year of the Christian era.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Latin historian, who flourished, as some suppose, either during the reign of Claudius, A. D. 54, or under that of Vespasian, A. D. 69. [No ancient writer makes mention of him; the first who speak of him are John of Salisbury and Pierre de Blois, who lived in the 12th century. Curtius himself furnishes no information respecting his own condition and origin, if we except one passage in which he speaks of an event which happened in his times. He mentions this event, however, in such obscure terms, that the commentators are all at variance respecting the period when he flourished. Some even carry him back to the age of Augustus, while others place him as low down as Constantine the Great, and even the first Theodosius.] He has rendered himself known by the history of the reign of Alexander the Great. This history was divided into 10 books, of which the two first, the end of the fifth, and the beginning of the sixth are lost. [This work is rather to be termed a romance than an historical composition. It is the production of a rhetorician who sacrifices truth to the desire of brilliancy of expression, and to a love of the marvellous. The harangues which he puts into the mouths of his heroes are mere scholastic declamations, without any regard to the characters of those who are to utter them. As a critical historian, Quintus Curtius is very far below mediocrity. He is only superficially acquainted with the good historians of Alexander, and appears to have given the preference to those Greek writers who had distorted by fable the true history of the Macedonian monarch, such as Clitarchus and Hegesippus. His compilation is made without any judgment; he gives himself no trouble to reconcile the contradictions which exist among the authors whom he follows, nor does he at all concern himself about testing the truth of their narratives. It would seem moreover that his knowledge of Greek was very slight. So ignorant is he of the military art, that it is difficult to understand his accounts of battles and sieges; and oftentimes it is but too apparent that he does not understand himself what he copies mechanically from others. In geography and astronomy his ignorance is equally great. He confounds Mount Taurus with Caucasus, and makes the Caspian and Hyrcanian Seas two different sheets of water. He observes no chronological order, and does not mention either the years or the seasons in which the events of which he treats took place. If, however, Quintus Curtius be refused the name of an historian, we cannot deny his claim to being considered an amusing and interesting writer. His diction is pure and elegant. Some of his harangues are master-pieces of their kind. He is rich in beautiful descriptions. His style is too ornamented, and sometimes declamatory: oftener, however, he happily imitates his model Livy.] Freinshemius has written a supplement to Curtius, in which he seems to have made some very satisfactory amends for the loss which the history has suffered, by a learned collection of facts and circumstances from all the different authors who have employed their pen in writing an account of Alexander and of his Asiatic conquests. Some suppose that the historian is the same with that Curtius Rufus who lived in the age of Claudius, under whom he was made consul. This Rufus was born of an obscure family, and he attended a Roman quæstor in Africa, when he was met at Adrumetum by a woman above the human shape, as he was walking under the porticoes in the middle of the day. This extraordinary character addressed the indigent Roman, and told him that the day would come in which he should govern Africa with consular power. This strange prophecy animated Rufus; he repaired to Rome, where he gained the favours of the emperor, obtained consular honours, and at last retired as pro-consul to Africa, where he died. The best editions of Curtius are those of Elzevir, 8vo. Amst. 1673; of Snakenburgh, 4to. L. Bat. 1724; and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1757. [The edition of Snakenburgh is decidedly the best.] Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 23, &c.

QUIRINALIA, festivals in honour of Romulus surnamed Quirinus, celebrated on the 13th of the calends of March.

QUIRINALIS, a hill at Rome, originally called Agonius, and afterwards Collinus. The name of Quirinalis it obtained from the inhabitants of Cures, who settled there under their king Tatius. It was also called Cabalinus, from two marble statues of horses, one of which was the work of Phidias, and the other of Praxiteles. Liv. 1, c. 44.—Ovid. Fast. 375. Met. 14, v. 845.—One of the gates of Rome near Mount Quirinalis.

QUIRINUS, a surname of Romulus when he had been made a god by his superstitious subjects. [The name is derived either from Quiris, a Sabine term for a spear, or from Cures, a Sabine city.] Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 475.—Sulpitius, a Roman consul born at Lanuvium. Though descended of an obscure family, he was raised to the greatest honours by Augustus. He was appointed governor of Syria, and was afterwards made preceptor to Caius, the grandson of the emperor. He married Æmilia Lepida, the grand-daughter of Sylla and Pompey, but some time after he shamefully repudiated her. He died A. D. 22. Tacit. Ann. 3, &c.

QUIRITES, a name given to the Roman citizens either because they admitted into their city the Sabines, who inhabited the town of Cures, and who on that account were called Quirites, [or from Quiris, a Sabine term for a spear.] After this union, the two nations were indiscriminately and promiscuously called by that name. It is, however, to be observed that the word was confined to Rome, and not used in the armies, as we find some of the generals applying it only to such of their soldiers as they dismissed or disgraced.

Even some of the emperors appeased a sedition by calling their rebellious soldiers by the degrading appellation of Quirites. [In this way Cæsar quelled a mutiny of the 10th legion.] Sueton. Cæs. 70.—Lamprid. 53.—Lucan. 5, v. 558.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 1. Varro de L. L. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 479.

RA

RABIRIUS, C. a Roman knight who lent an immense sum of money to Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. The monarch afterwards not only refused to repay him, but even confined him, and endangered his life. Rabirius escaped from Egypt with difficulty, but at his return to Rome, he was accused by the senate of having lent money to an African prince, for unlawful purposes. He was ably defended by Cicero, and escaped with difficulty. Cic. pro Rab.—A Latin poet in the age of Augustus, who wrote, besides satires and epigrams, a poem on the victory which the emperor had gained over Antony at Actium.—[Another, accused and condemned before the Decemviri for having slain in a sedition, 36 years before, A Saturninus. He appealed to the people, and was defended by Cicero, but escaped only by Metellus taking down the standard from the Janiculum, and thus dissolving the assembly.]

RAMNES, or RHAMNENSES, one of the three centuries instituted by Romulus. After the Roman people had been divided into three tribes, the monarch elected out of each 100 young men of the best and noblest families, with which he formed three companies of horse. One of them was called Rhamnenses or Ramnes, either from the tribe of which it was chosen, or from Romulus. Another was called Tatienses or Titienses, from Titus Tatius, and the third Luceres, [either from Lucumo, an Etrurian, or from lucus, the grove which Romulus made an asylum. The Rhamnenses consisted of Romans, and inhabited the Palatine hill, the Tatienses of Sabines, and dwelt on the Capitoline hill; the Luceres were composed of all the foreigners who came successively to Rome, after the union with the Sabines. This arrangement, however, was subsequently altered. vd. Equites.] Varro de L. L. 4, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Horat. de Art. poet. 340.—Plut. in Rom.

RAVENNA, a town of Italy on the Adriatic, which became celebrated under the Roman emperors, and first under Augustus, for its capacious though artificial harbour, which could contain 250 ships, and for being for some time the seat of the western empire. It was difficult of access by land, as it stood on a small peninsula; and so ill supplied with water, that it sold at a higher price than wine, according to Martial. The emperors kept one of their fleets there, and the other at Misenum, on the other side of Italy. It was founded by a colony of Thessalians, or, according to others, of Sabines. [In the time of Strabo, it was situate in the midst of a marsh, and attached to the continent, but in process of time the Po accumulated mud and sand, so that the land was raised and the sea removed to a greater distance. Honorius made this city the place of his residence both before and after Alaric had captured and burnt Rome. When Odoacer made a conquest of Italy he resided at Ravenna, and sustained here a siege of three years, at the termination of which he was taken and slain by Theodoric. This latter monarch fixed the seat of his empire here, and greatly adorned and embellished the place. Here also resided the exarch or governor appointed by the emperor of the east when Italy was in possession of the Lombards.] It is now fallen from its former grandeur, and is a wretched town, situate at the distance of about three miles from the sea, and surrounded with swamps and marshes. [In the time of the Romans it was seated on a kind of bay. The mud thrown up by the tide has formed a tract of land, which is cultivated, and on which the city itself has been enlarged towards the sea. The air is insalubrious, but has been somewhat amended by conveying along the sides of the city the rivers Mentone and Ronco, which carry off the fœtid water from the marshy grounds.] Strab. 5.—Suet. in Aug. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Martial. 3, ep. 93, v. 8, &c.

RAURĂCI, a people of Gaul, whose chief town is now August on the Rhine. Cæs. G. 1, c. 5.

REĂTE, a pleasant town [in the country of the Sabines, on the river Velinus, a branch of the Nar.] It was built, as some suppose, before the Trojan war. Cybele was the chief deity of the place. It was famous for its asses. Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Varro de R. R. 1.—Liv. 25, c. 7, l. 26, c. 11, l. 28, c. 45.—Cic. Cat. N. D. 2, c. 2.

REDICŪLUS, a deity whose name is derived from the word redire, (to return.) The Romans raised a temple to the imaginary deity on the spot where Annibal had retired when he approached Rome, as if to besiege it. Festus. de V. sig.

REDŌNES, a nation among the Amorici, now the people of Rennes and St. Moteos, in Brittany. Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 41.

REGILLÆ, or REGILLUM, a town in the country of the Sabines in Italy, about 20 miles from Rome, celebrated for a battle which was fought there, A. U. C. 258. between 24,000 Romans, and 40,000 Etrurians, who were headed by the Tarquins. The Romans obtained the victory, and scarce 10,000 of the enemy escaped from the field of battle. Castor and Pollux, according to some accounts, were seen mounted on white horses, and fighting at the head of the Roman army. Liv. 2, c. 16.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Plut. in Cor.—Val. Max. 1.—Flor. 1.—Suet. Tib. 1.

REGILLIANUS, Q. NONIUS, a Dacian who entered the Roman armies, and was raised to the greatest honours under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were dissatisfied with Gallienus, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 262.

REGILLUS, a small lake of Latium, whose waters fall into the Anio, at the east of Rome. The dictator Posthumius defeated the Latin army near it. Liv. 2, c. 19.

REGIUM LEPIDUM, a town of Modena, now Regio, at the south of the Po. Plin. 3, c. 15.—Cic. 12, fam. 5, l. 13, ep. 7.

M. ATTILIUS REGULUS, a consul during the first Punic war. He reduced Brundisium, and in his second consulship he took 64 and sunk 30 galleys of the Carthaginian fleet, on the coast of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and so rapid was his success, that in a short time he defeated three generals, and made himself master of about 200 places of consequence on the coast. The Carthaginians sued for peace, but the conqueror refused to grant it, and soon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken prisoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage. He was afterwards sent by the enemy to Rome, to propose an accommodation and an exchange of prisoners; and if his commission was unsuccessful he was bound by the most solemn oaths to return to Carthage without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy proposed, and when his opinion had had due influence on the senate, Regulus retired to Carthage agreeable to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to punish him with the greatest severity. His eye-brows were cut, and he was exposed for some days to the excessive heat of the meridian sun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whose sides were every where filled with large iron spikes, till he died in the greatest agonies. His sufferings were heard at Rome, and the senate permitted his widow to inflict whatever punishment she pleased on some of the most illustrious captives of Carthage, who were in their hands. She confined them also in presses filled with sharp iron points, and was so exquisite in her cruelty, that the senate at last interfered, and stopped the barbarity of her punishments. Regulus died about 251 years before Christ. Sil. 6, v. 319.—Flor. 2, c. 3.—Horat. 2, od. 5.—Cic. de Off.

1, c. 13.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 2.—Liv. ep. 16.—Memmius, a Roman made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in his province, the emperor wished to bring the celebrated statue of Jupiter Olympus, by Phidias, to Rome; but this was supernaturally prevented, and, according to ancient authors, the ship which was to convey it was destroyed by lightning, and the workmen who attempted to remove the statue, were terrified away by sudden noises. Dio. Cass.—A man who condemned Sejanus.—Roscius, a man who held the consulship but for one day, in the reign of Vitellius.

REMI, a nation of Gaul, whose principal town, Duricortorium, is now Rheims. Plin. 5, c. 17.—Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 5.

REMMIA LEX de judiciis, was enacted to punish all calumniators. The letter K was marked on their forehead. This law was abolished by Constantine the Great. Cic. pro Ros.

REMÜLUS SYLVIUS, a king of Alba, destroyed by lightning on account of his impiety. Ovid. Trist. 4, v. 50.

REMURIA, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, to appease the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

REMUS, the brother of Romulus, was exposed together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the contest which happened between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus, for ridiculing the rising walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himself. [vid. Romulus.] The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was consulted, and the manes of Remus appeased by the institution of the Remuria. Ovid.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus against Æneas. *Verg. RESÆNA, [or Theodosiopolis, now Ras-vin, or Ain-verdah, a town of Mesopotamia on the banks of the Chaboras.] It was famous for the defeat of Sapor by Gordian.

RHA, a large river, now the Volga, of Russia. [The name Rha appears to be an appellative term, having affinity with Rhea or Raka, which, in the Sarmatian or Slavonian language, signifies "a river;" and from the Russian denomination of Velika Reka, or "Great River," appears to be formed the name of Volga. In the Byzantine and other writers of the middle ages, this stream is called Atel or Etel, a term, in many northern languages, signifying great or illustrious. The approximation of the Tanais to this river, before it changes its course to the Palus Mæotis, is the occasion of the erroneous opinion of some authors, that it is only an emanation of the Rha taking a different route.]

RHACIUS, a Cretan prince, the first of that nation who entered Ionia with a colony. He seized Claros, of which he became the sovereign. He married Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, who had been seized on his coasts. Paus. 7, c. 3.

RHACŌTIS, an ancient name of Alexandria, the capital of Egypt. Strab.—Paus. 5, c. 21.

RHADAMANTHUS, a son of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the 30th year of his age. He passed into some of the Cyclades, where he reigned with so much justice and impartiality, that the ancients have said he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confess their crimes, and in punishing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over some of the Cyclades but over many of the Greek cities of Asia. Paus. 8, c. 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 435.—Diod. 5.—Plato.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 566.

RHADAMISTUS, a son of Pharnasmanes, king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates, king of Armenia, and some time after put him to death. He was put to death by his father for his cruelties, about the year 52 of the Christian era. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 37.

RHÆTI, or RÆTI, an ancient and warlike nation of Etruria. They were driven from their native country by the Gauls, and went to settle on the other side of the Alps. vid. Rhætia. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Justin. 20, c. 5.

RHÆTIA, [a country of Europe, which occupied a part of the Alps, and was situate to the north of Italy and east of Helvetia. It is not easy to ascertain its limits to the north, but we may say that it was bounded in that quarter by Vindelicia, and in general that it corresponded to the country of the Grisons, and to the cantons of Uri, Glaris, &c. as far as the Lake of Constance: it extended also over the Tyrol. This country was called western Illyricum, and was subjected to the Romans by Drusus, in the reign of Augustus. Soon afterwards Vindelicia was reduced by Tiberius, so that the Roman possessions extended to the Danube. This double conquest formed a province called Rhætia, comprehending Vindelicia, without obliterating altogether the distinction. But in the multiplication that Dioclesian, and some other emperors after him, made of the provinces, Rhætia was divided into two, under the names of Prima and Secunda: a circumstance which caused Rhætia Proper and Vindelicia to re-assume their primitive distinctions.] Virg. G. 2, v. 96.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 3, c. 20, l. 14, c. 2, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 4 and 14.

RHAMNUS, a town of Attica, famous for a temple of Amphiaræus, and a statue of the goddess Nemesis, who was from thence called Rhamnusia. [vid. Nemesis.] Paus. 1.—Plin. 36.

RHAMNUSIA, a name of Nemesis. vid. Rhamnus.

RHAMPSINITUS, an opulent king of Egypt who succeeded Proteus. He built a large tower with stones at Memphis, where his riches were deposited, and of which he was robbed by the artifice of the architect, who had left a stone in the wall easily moveable so as to admit a plunderer. Herodot. 2, c. 121, &c.

RHAMSES, or RAMISES, a powerful king of Egypt, who, with an army of 700,000 men, conquered Æthiopia, Libya, Persia, and other eastern nations. In his reign, according to Pliny, Troy was taken. Some authors consider him to be the same as Sesostris. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Plin. 36, c. 3.

RHAROS, or RHARIUM, a plain of Attica, where corn was first sown by Triptolemus. It received its name from the sower's father, who was called Rharos. Paus. 1, c. 14 and 38.

RHEA, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom she had Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her husband, however, devoured them all as soon as born, as he had succeeded to the throne with the solemn promise that he would raise no male children, or, according to others, because he had been informed by an oracle, that one of his sons would dethrone him. To stop the cruelty of her husband, Rhea consulted her parents, and was advised to impose upon him, or perhaps, to fly into Crete. Accordingly, when she brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured a stone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were soon proved to be well-founded. A year after, the child, whose name was Jupiter, became so strong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologists with some of the other goddesses, and many have supposed that she was the same divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymene, Magna mater, Ceres, Vesta, Titæa, and Terra, Tellus and Ops. [vid. Cybele, Ceres, Vesta, &c.] Rhea, after the expulsion of her husband from his throne, followed him to Italy, where he established a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was so great, that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Hesiod. Theog.—Orpheus, in Hymn.—Homer. ib.—Æschyl. Prom.—*Euripid. RHEDŌNES. vid. Redones.

RHEGIUM, now Rheggio, a town of Italy, in the country of the Bruttii, opposite Messina in Sicily, where a colony of Messenians under Alcidas settled, B. C. 723. It was originally called Rhegium, and afterwards Rhegium Julium, to distinguish it from Rhegium Lepidi, a town of Cisalpine Gaul. Some suppose that it received its name from the Greek word ῥηγνυμι, to break, because it is situate on the straits of Carybdis, which were formed when the island of Sicily was broken and separated by an earthquake from the continent of Italy. [After Rhegium had fallen under the power of the Romans, a legion placed there in garrison, encouraged by the example of the Mamertines, revolted A. U.

C. 472, and took possession of the city. After they had held it for ten years, it was besieged and taken by the Romans, and those who escaped the destruction of the siege, to the number of about 300, were carried to Rome, where they were scourged and beheaded.] This town has always been subject to great earthquakes, by which it has often been destroyed. The neighbourhood is remarkable for its great fertility, and for its delightful views. Sil. 13, v. 94.—Cic. pro Arch. 3.—*Ovid. RHEMI. vid. Remi.

RHENE, a small island of the Ægean, about 200 yards from Delos, 18 miles in circumference. [vid. Delos.] The inhabitants of Delos always buried their dead there, and their women also retired there during their labour, as their own island was consecrated to Apollo, where Latona had brought forth, and where no dead bodies were to be inhumed. Strabo says, that it was uninhabited, though it was once as populous and flourishing as the rest of the Cyclades. Polycrates conquered it, and consecrated it to Apollo, after he had tied it to Delos by means of a long chain. Rheneas was sometimes called the small Delos, and the island of Delos the great Delos. Thucyd. 3.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

RHENI, a people on the borders of the Rhine.

RHENUS, [a celebrated river of Europe, rising in the Lepontine Alps, a little to the east of Mount St. Gothard, in the county of Grisons. It passes through Lacus Brigantinus, or the Lake of Constance, and afterwards through Lacus Acronius, or the Lake of Zell, and continues to run nearly west until it reaches Basilia, or Basle. Here it takes a northern direction, and becomes the boundary between Gallia and Germania, and afterwards between the latter and Belgium. At Schenck, or Schenken Schans the Rheneas sends off its left-hand branch, the Vahalis or Waal, which flows west and joins the Mosa or Meuse. After parting with that of the Vahalis, the Rheneas flows on a few miles farther to the north, and then divides into two streams, of which the one to the right had the name of Flevo, or Flevus, or Flevum, now the Yssel, and the other that of Helium, now the Leck. The latter joins the Meuse above Rotterdam. The Yssel was originally unconnected with the Rhine, but was joined to it by the canal of Drusus. Before it reached the sea it traversed a small lake called Flevo, which, by the increase of waters it received through the Yssel from the Rhine, became in time expanded, and forms now the Zuyder Zee. vid. Flevo. The whole course of the Rhine is 600 miles.] Virgil has called it bicornis, because it divides itself into two streams. The river Rhine was a long time a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, and on that account its banks were covered with strong castles. J. Cæsar was the first Roman who crossed it to invade Germany. The waters of that river were held in great veneration, and were supposed by the ancient Germans to have some peculiar virtue, as they threw their children into it, either to try the fidelity of the mothers or to brace and invigorate their limbs. If the child swam on the surface, the mother was acquitted of suspicion, but if it sunk to the bottom, its origin was deemed illegitimate. *Ovid. RHESUS, a king of Thrace, son of the Strymon and Terpsichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conquests in Europe, he marched to the assistance of Priam, king of Troy, against the Greeks. He was expected with great impatience, as an ancient oracle had declared that Troy should never be taken if the horses of Rhesus drank the waters of the Xanthus, and fed upon the grass of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their best generals, Diomedes and Ulysses, were commissioned by the rest to intercept the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, slew him, and carried away his horses to their camp. Hom. Il. 10.—Dictys. Cret. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 473.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 98.

RHĒANUS, a Greek poet of Thrace, originally a slave. He wrote an account of the war between Sparta and Messenia, which continued for twenty years, as also an history of the principal revolutions and events which had taken place in Thessaly. Of this poetical composition, nothing but a few verses are extant. He flourished about 200 years before the Christian era. Paus. 4, c. 6.

RHMOTĀCLES, a king of Thrace, who revolted from Antony to Augustus. He boasted of his attachment to the emperor's person at an entertainment, upon which Augustus said, proditiōnem amo, proditores vero odi.

RHINOCOLŪRA, a town on the borders of Palestine and Egypt. [It derived its name, according to Strabo, from the circumstance of offenders being sent thither as to a place of exile, after having been first deprived of their noses, (ῥιν, nasus, and κωλυω), a custom said to have been practised by one of the Æthiopian invaders of Egypt. Diodorus Siculus says that this town was destitute of all the conveniences of life, that its water was bitter and noxious, and that it was surrounded with salt marshes. It was in the vicinity of this place that the Israelites were nourished with quails.] Liv. 45, c. 11.

RHION a promontory of Achaia, opposite to Antirrhium in Ætolia, at the mouth of the Corinthian gulf, called also the Dardanelles of Lepanto. The strait between Naupaetum and Patra bore also the same name. The tomb of Hesiod was at the top of the promontory. Liv. 27, c. 30, l. 38, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Paus. 7, c. 22.

ΡΗΙΦΑΙΑ, large mountains at the north of Scythia, where, as some suppose, the Gorgons had fixed their residence. The name of Riphæan was applied to any cold mountain in a northern country, and indeed these mountains seem to have existed only in the imagination of the poets, though some make the Tanais rise there. [What are celebrated in antiquity by the name of Riphæi Montes do not exist near the sources of the Tanais as Ptolemy represents. If he marks a chain of mountains more to the north, actual observation affords nothing corresponding: except it be the chain which separates Russia from Siberia.] Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 3, v. 272, l. 3, v. 282, l. 4, v. 418.—*Virg. ΡΗΙΟΜ. vid. Rhion.

RHODA, now Roses, a sea-port town of Spain. Liv. 34, c. 8.

RHODANUS, [or Rhone, a large and rapid river of Europe, rising among the Lepontine Alps, not more than two leagues south of the sources of the Rhine. It passes through the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva, five leagues below which it disappears between two rocks for a considerable way, rises again, flows with great rapidity in a southern direction, and discharges itself by three mouths into the Sinus Gallicus, or Gulf of Lyons, in the Mediterranean. The largest of these mouths was, in the days of Pliny, called Masilioticum, the other two were much less, and had the common name of Libyca, although each was also known by a distinct appellation. Hispaniense Ostium denoted the western or the one next to Hispania, and Metapinum, that in the middle. The course of the Rhone is about 400 miles, during which it falls 5400 feet. In Strabo's time it was navigable some distance up; but its mouths are now so full of rocks, brought down from the mountains by its impetuous current, that no ship can enter them. The upward navigation in smaller vessels, can only, on account of the rapid current, be performed by draught or steam. This river is largest in summer, and is at its greatest height soon after the longest day. This is most probably occasioned by the heat of the sun melting part of the snow on the Alps during the summer months. For some remarks on the origin of the name Rhodanus, vid. Eridanus.] Mela, 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Sil. 3, v. 477.—Marcell. 15, &c.—*Cæsar. Bell. RHODOΓΥΝΗ, a daughter of Phraates, king of Parthia, who married Demetrius when he was in banishment at her father's court. Polyæn. 8.

RHODŌPE, or RHODŌPIS, a celebrated courtesan of Greece, who was fellow-servant with Æsop, at the court of a king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and her liberty was at last bought by Charaxes of Mitylene, the brother of Sappho, who was enamoured of her, and who married her. She sold her favours at Naucratis, where she collected so much money, that, to render her name immortal, she consecrated a number of spits in the temple of Apollo at Delphi; or, according to others, erected one of the pyramids of Egypt. Ælian says, that as Rhodope was one day bathing herself, an eagle carried away one of her sandals, and dropped it near Psammethichus, king of Egypt, at Memphis. The monarch was struck with the beauty of the sandal, strict inquiry was made to find the owner, and Rhodope, when discovered, married Psammethichus. Herodot. 2, c. 134, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 15.—Ælian. V. H. c. 33. [Perizonius, in his notes on Ælian, says that there were two of this name; one a courtesan, who afterwards became the wife of Psammethichus; the other, the fellow-slave of Æsop, who lived in the time of Anasis; but Larcher satisfactorily shows that Perizonius is mistaken.]

RHŌDŌPE, a high mountain of Thrace, [forming in a great degree its western boundary.] Rhodope, according to the poets, was the wife of Hæmus, king of Thrace, who was changed into this mountain, because she preferred herself to Juno in beauty. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 87, &c.—Virg. Ecl. 8, G. 3, v. 351.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 7.—Ital. 2, v. 73.—Senec. in Herc. Oct.

RHODUNIA, the top of Mount Ceta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

RHODUS, a celebrated island in the Carpathian Sea, at the south of Caria, from which it is distant about 20 miles. [Pliny makes it 125 miles in circuit, but Isidorus only 103. According to Sonnini, it is much longer than it is broad, its greatest length, in a direction from N to S, being about 12 leagues, and its breadth 6; while its circumference is commonly estimated at 44 leagues. Its form is nearly triangular, whence it obtained the name of Trinacria. It was also known by the several names of Ophiusa, Asteria, Æthrea, Cerymbia, Poessa, Atabyria, Marcia, Oloessa, Stadia, Telchinis, Pelagia, and Rhodus. The last has prevailed with a slight change, in latter ages, and the etymology has been sought in the Greek ῥόδον, signifying a rose, with which flower the isle abounded. In confirmation of this etymology it has been alleged, that several Rhodian coins are still extant, exhibiting on the one side the sun, and on the other a rose. Diodorus Siculus deduces the name from Rhoda, the daughter of Apollo and Venus. Others, however, have preferred the etymology of Bochart, who, availing himself of one of its ancient names, Ophiusa, or Snake-Island, given to it on account of the numerous serpents it contained when first inhabited, says that the Phœnicians also called it "Snake-Island," which in their language was Gesirat-Rhod. From this last word, which signifies a snake, the Greeks, he thinks, formed the name Rhodos.] Its principal cities were Rhodes, founded about 408 years before the Christian era, Lindus, Camisus, Jalytus. Rhodes was famous for the siege which it supported against Demetrius, and for a celebrated statue of Apollo. (vid. Colossus.) The Rhodians were originally governed by kings, and were independent, but this government was at last exchanged for a democracy and an aristocracy. They were naturally given up to commerce, and during many ages they were the most powerful nation by sea. Their authority was respected, and their laws were so universally approved, that every country made use of them to decide disputes concerning maritime affairs, and they were at last adopted by other commercial nations, and introduced into the Roman codes, from whence they have been extracted to form the basis of the maritime regulations of modern Europe. When Alexander made himself master of Asia, the Rhodians lost their independence, but they soon after asserted their natural privileges under his cruel successors, and continued to hold that influence among nations to which their maritime power and consequence entitled them. They assisted Pompey against Cæsar, and were defeated by Cassius, and became dependent upon the Romans. [In the reign of Vespasian, Rhodes along with the other isles, was reduced to a Roman province, styled the "province of the islands." In a later age it fell into the hands of the knights of St. John, who were afterwards, A. D. 1523, upon the conquest of the island by Soliman, compelled to retire to Malta. Rhodes was anciently very fertile, and needs even now but little cultivation to become very productive.] Strab. 5.—*Homer. ROBIGO, or RUBIGO, a goddess at Rome, particularly worshipped by husbandmen, as she presided over corn. ROMA, a city of Italy, the capital of the Roman empire; situate on the banks of the river Tiber, at the distance of about 16 miles from the sea. [vid. column 8, line 36, of this article.] The name of its founder, and the manner of its foundation, are not precisely known. Romulus, however, is universally supposed to have laid the foundations of that celebrated city, on the 21st of April, according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Christ, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the 4th year of the 6th Olympiad. In its original state, Rome was but a small castle on the summit of Mount Palatine; and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation, or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a standard as a common asylum for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the punishment which attended them. From such an assemblage a numerous body was soon collected, and before the death of the founder, the Romans had covered with their habitations, the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, Esquiline hills, with Mount Cælius, and Quirinalis. After many successful wars against the neighbouring states, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into classes, the interests of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labours of the subject, as well as those of his patron, tended to the same end, the aggrandizement of the state. Under the successors of Romulus, the power of Rome was increased, and the boundaries of her dominions extended; while one was employed in regulating the forms of worship, and in inculcating in the minds of his subjects a reverence for the deity, the other was engaged in enforcing discipline among the army, and raising the consequence of the soldiers in the government of the state, and a third made the object of his administration consist in adorning his capital, in beautifying the edifices, and in fortifying it with towers and walls. During 244 years, the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppression, and the violence of the last of these monarchs, and of his family, became so atrocious, that a revolution was effected in the state, and the democratical government was established. The monarchical government existed under seven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B. C. 753; and after one year's interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hostilius, 672; Ancus Martius, 640; Tarquin Priscus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534; expelled 25 years after, B. C. 509; and this regal administration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulsion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more sensible of their consequence; with their liberty they acquired a spirit of faction, and they became so jealous of their independence, that the first of their consuls who had been the most zealous and animated in the assertion of their freedom, was banished from the city because he bore the name, and was of the family of the tyrants; and another, to stop their suspicions, was obliged to pull down his house, whose stateliness and magnificence above the rest seemed incompatible with the duties and the rank of a private citizen. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with success against Porsenna, the king of Etruria, and some of the neighbouring states, who supported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by force of arms. A government which is intrusted into the hands of two of the most distinguished of its members, for the limited space of one year, cannot but give rise to great men, glorious exploits, and tremendous seditions. The general who is placed at the head of an army during a campaign must be active and diligent when he knows that his power is terminated with the year, and if he has a becoming ambition, he will distinguish his consulship by some uncommon act of valour, before he descends from the dignity of an absolute magistrate to the dependence of a fellow-citizen. Yet these attempts for the attainment of glory often fail of success, and though the Romans could once boast that every individual in their armies could discharge with fidelity and honour the superior offices of magistrate and consul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or disgraced by the ill conduct, the oppression, and the wantonness of their generals. (vid. Consul.) To the fame which their conquests and daily successes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual rise to superiority; and to this may be added the policy of the Census, which every fifth year told them their actual strength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. And indeed it was no small satisfaction to a people who were continually making war, to see, that in spite of all the losses which they might sustain in the field, the increase of the inhabitants of the city was prodigious, and almost incredible: and had Romulus lived after the battle of Actium, he would have been persuaded with difficulty that above four millions of inhabitants were contained within those walls, which in the most flourishing period of his reign could scarce muster an army of 3000 infantry, and 300 horse. But when Rome had flourished under the consular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleasure the conquests of her citizens over the neighbouring states and cities, which, according to a Roman historian, she was ashamed to recollect in the summit of her power, an irruption of the barbarians of Gaul rendered her very existence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguished. The valour of an injured individual, (vid. Camillus,) saved it from destruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to ashes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious era to the Romans. The huts and cottages which Romulus had erected, and all his successors repaired, were totally consumed, and when the city arose again from its ruins, the streets were enlarged, convenience as well as order was observed, taste and regularity were consulted, and the poverty, ignorance, and rusticity of the Romans seemed to be extinguished with their old habitations. But no sooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms against those states which refused to acknowledge their superiority, or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines displayed their character in a different view; if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their sword for glory; and here we may see them conquered in the field, and yet refusing to grant that peace for which their conqueror himself had sued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in losing or gaining a victory the Romans were enabled to examine the manœuvres, observe the discipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments of those soldiers whose friends and ancestors had accompanied Alexander the Great in the conquest of Asia. Italy became subjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the second age, or the adolescence of the Roman empire. After this memorable era they tried their strength not only with distant nations, but also upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged against Carthage, they acquired territory and obtained the sovereignty of the sea; and though Annibal for sixteen years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates, and destroyed their armies almost before their walls, yet they were destined to conquer, [vid. Punicum bellum,] and soon to add the kingdom of Macedonia [vid. Macedonicum bellum,] and the provinces of Asia [vid. Mithridaticum bellum,] to their empire. But while we consider the Romans as a nation subduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counsels, and their pursuits are not to be forgotten. To be warriors was their profession; their assemblies in the Campus Martius were a meeting of armed men, and very properly denominated an army. Yet while their conquests were so extensive abroad, we find them torn by factions at home; and so far was the resentment of the poorer citizens carried, that we see the enemy at the gates of the city, while all are unwilling to take up arms and to unite in the defence of their common liberty. The senators and nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavoured to retain in their hands that influence which had been exercised with so much success and such cruelty by their monarchs. This was the continual occasion of tumults and sedition. The people were jealous of their liberty. The oppression of the nobles irritated them, and the stripes to which they were too often exposed without mercy, was often productive of revolutions. The plebeians, though originally the poorest and most contemptible of citizens of an indigent nation, whose food in the first ages of the empire was only bread and salt, whose drink was water, soon gained rights and privileges by their opposition. Though really slaves, they became powerful in the state; one concession from the patricians produced another, and when their independence was boldly asserted by their tribunes, they were admitted to share in the highest offices of the state, and the laws which forbad the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families were repealed, and the meanest peasant could by valour and fortitude be raised to the dignity of dictator and consul. It was not till these privileges were obtained by the people from the senate, that Rome began to enjoy internal peace and tranquillity, her battles were then fought with more vigour, her soldiers were more animated, and her sovereignty was more universally established. But supreme power lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen becomes too dangerous. The greatest oppression and tyranny took place of subordination and obedience; and from those causes proceeded the unparalleled slaughter and effusion of blood under a Sylla or a Marius. It has been justly observed, that the first Romans conquered their enemies by valour, temperance, and fortitude; their moderation also and their justice was well known among their neighbours, and not only private possessions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires, were left in their power, to be distributed among a family, or to be ensured in the hand of a successor. They were also chosen umpires to decide quarrels, but in this honourable office they consulted their own interest; they artfully supported the weaker side, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J. Cæsar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented excess; it was not merely to avenge a private injury, but it was a contest for the sovereignty; and though each of the adversaries wore the mask of pretended sincerity, and professed himself to be the supporter of the republic, not less than the abolition of freedom and the public liberty was the aim. What Julius began, his adopted son achieved, the ancient spirit of national independence was extinguished at Rome, and after the battle of Actium, the Romans seemed unable to govern themselves without the assistance of a chief, who, under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after some signal victory, reigned with as much power and as much sovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life, they had long forgot to appear in the field, and their wars were left to be waged by mercenary troops, who fought without spirit or animosity, and who were ever ready to yield to him who bought their allegiance and fidelity with the greatest sums of money. Their leaders themselves were not the most prudent or the most humane, the power which they had acquired by bribery was indeed precarious, and among a people where not only the highest offices of the state, but even the imperial purple itself, are exposed to sale, there cannot be expected much happiness or tranquillity in the palace of the emperor. The reigns of the successors of Augustus were distinguished by variety; one of them the most abandoned and most profligate of men, whom his own vices and extravagance hurried out of the world, while his successor, perhaps the most clement, just, and popular of princes, was sacrificed in the midst of his guards and attendants by the dagger of some offended favourite or disappointed eunuch. Few indeed were the emperors of Rome whose days were not shortened by poison or the sword of an assassin. If one for some time had the imprudence to trust himself in the midst of a multitude, at last to perish by his own credulity, the other consulted his safety, but with no better success, in the innumerable chambers of his palace, and changed every day, to elude discovery, the place of his retirement. After they had been governed by a race of princes remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman possessions were divided into two distinct empires, by the enterprising Constantine, A. D. 328. Constantinople became the seat of the eastern empire, and Rome remained in possession of the western emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the Christian era, Rome with Italy was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the west, into the hands of the Pope, who still continues to hold the sovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Ecclesiastical States. The original poverty of the Romans has often been disguised by their poets and historians, who wished it to appear, that a nation who were masters of the world, had had better beginning than to be a race of shepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this simplicity they were indebted for their successes. Their houses were originally destitute of every ornament, they were made with unequal boards and covered with mud, and these served them rather as a shelter against the inclemency of the seasons than for relaxation and ease. Till the age of Pyrrhus they despised riches, and many salutary laws were enacted to restrain luxury and to punish indolence. They observed great temperance in their meals: young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their 30th year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national spirit was supported by policy; the triumphal procession of a conqueror along the streets amidst the applause of thousands, was well calculated to promote emulation, and the number of gladiators which were regularly introduced, not only in public games and spectacles, but also at private meetings, served to cherish their fondness for war, whilst it steeled their hearts against the calls of compassion, and when they could gaze with pleasure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another, they were not inactive in the destruction of those whom they considered as inveterate foes or formidable rivals in the field. In their punishments, civil as well as military, the Romans were strict and rigorous; a deserter was severely whipped and sold as a slave, and the degradation from the rank of a soldier and dignity of a citizen was the most ignominious stigma which could be fixed upon a seditious mutineer. The transmarine victories of the Romans proved at last the ruin of their innocence and bravery. They grew fond of the luxury of the Asiatics; and, conquered by the vices and indolence of those nations whom they had subdued, they became as effeminate and as dissolute as their captives. Marcellus was the first who introduced a taste for the fine arts among his countrymen. The spoils and treasures that were obtained in the plunder of Syracuse and Corinth, rendered the

Romans partial to elegant refinement and ornamental equipage. Though Cato had despised philosophy, [vid. Carneades,] and declared that war was the only profession of his countrymen, the Romans, by their intercourse with the Greeks, soon became fond of literature; and though they had once banished the sophists of Athens from their city, yet they beheld with rapture their settlement among them, in the principal towns of Italy, after the conquest of Achaia. They soon after began to imitate their polished captives, and to cultivate poetry with success. From the valour of their heroes and conquerors, indeed, the sublimest subjects were offered to the genius of their poets; but of the little that remains to celebrate the early victories of Rome, nothing can be compared to the nobler effusions of the Augustan age. Virgil has done so much for the Latin name that the splendour and the triumphs of his country are forgotten for a while, when we are transported with admiration of the majesty of his numbers, the elegant delicacy of his expressions, and the fire of his muse; and the applauses given to the lyric powers of Horace, the softness of Tibullus, the vivacity of Ovid, and to the superior compositions of other respectable poets shall be unceasing so long as the name of Rome excites our reverence and our praises, and so long as genius, virtue, and abilities are honoured amongst mankind. Though they originally rejected with horror a law which proposed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, yet the Romans soon proved favourable to the compositions of their countrymen. Livius was the first dramatic writer of consequence at Rome, whose plays began to be exhibited A. U. C. 514. After him Nævius and Ennius wrote for the stage; and in a more polished period, Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius and Afranius, claimed the public attention, and gained the most unbounded applause. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till 100 years after the introduction of comedy, and so celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In historical writing the progress of the Romans was slow, and for many years they employed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the superior abilities of a Livy were made known. In their worship and sacrifices the Romans were uncommonly superstitious, the will of the gods was consulted on every occasion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous assurance from the augurs, that the omens were propitious, and his success almost indubitable. Their sanctuaries were numerous, they raised altars not only to the gods, who, as they supposed, presided over their city, but also to the deities of conquered nations, as well as to the different passions and virtues. There were no less than 420 temples at Rome, crowded with statues; the priests were numerous, and each divinity had a particular college of sacerdotal servants. Their wars were declared in the most awful and solemn manner, and prayers were always offered in the temples for the prosperity of Rome, when a defeat had been sustained, or a victory won. The power of fathers over their children was very extensive, and indeed unlimited; they could sell them or put them to death at pleasure, without the forms of trial, or the interference of the civil magistrates. Many of the ancient families were celebrated for the great men which they had produced, but the vigorous and interested part they took in the government of the republic exposed them often to danger; and some have observed that the Romans sunk into indolence and luxury when the Cornelii, the Fabii, the Æmylii, the Marcelli, &c. who had so often supported their spirit and led them to victory, had been extinguished in the bloody wars of Marius and of the two triumvirates. When Rome was become powerful, she was distinguished from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens, a form of worship was established to her as a deity, and temples were raised in her honour, not only in the city but in the provinces. The goddess Roma was represented like Minerva, all armed, and sitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. Liv. 1, &c.—*Cato. de R. [The origin commonly assigned to the city of Rome appears to rest on no better foundation than mere fabulous tradition. The uncertainty which prevailed on this subject, even in ancient times, is clearly evinced by the numerous and varying accounts of the origin of that city which are mentioned by Plutarch in the introduction to his life of Romulus. The words of the biographer are as follows: "From whom, and for what cause, the city of Rome obtained that name, historians are not agreed. Some say that the Pelasgi, after they had overrun great part of the globe, and conquered many nations, settled there; and gave their city the name of Rome on account of their strength (Ρωμα) in war. Others inform us that when Troy was taken, some of the Trojans, having escaped and gained their ships, put to sea, and, being driven by the winds upon the coast of Tu-cany, came to an anchor in the river Tiber; that here, their wives being much fatigued and no longer able to bear the hardships of the sea, one of them, superior to the rest in birth and prudence, named Roma, proposed that they should burn the fleet; that this being effected, the men were at first much exasperated; but afterwards, through necessity, fixed their seat on the Palatine hill, and in a short time found things succeed beyond their expectations; for the country was good and the people hospitable: that therefore, besides other honours paid to Roma, they called the city (as she was the cause of its being built) after her name. Among the various accounts of historians," continues Plutarch, "it is said that Roma was the daughter of Italus and Leucaria; or of Telephus the son of Hercules, and married to Æneas; or of Ascanius the son of Æneas, and that she gave name to the city: others assert that Romanus, the son of Ulysses and Circe, built it; or Romus, the son of Æmation, whom Diomed sent from Troy; or Romus, king of the Latins, after he had expelled the Tuscans. Even they who declare that the city had its name from Romulus, are far from agreeing about his extraction: for some state that he was the son of Æneas and Dexthea, and was brought an infant into Italy with his brother Remus; that all the other vessels were lost by the violence of the flood, except that containing the children, which being carried gently to the shore where the bank was level, they were saved beyond expectation, and the place from them called Roma. Some will have it that Roma, daughter of the Trojan woman who was married to Latinus, the son of Telemachus, was the mother of Romulus. Others say that Æmilia, the daughter of Æneas and Lavinia, had him by Mars; and others again make Romulus and Remus sons of Priapus, by a maid-servant of Parchetius, king of the Albans."—Thus far Plutarch. From the passage which has here been cited, two conclusions are evidently to be deduced: first, that the true origin of Rome was to the ancients themselves a fertile theme of controversy; and, secondly, that from the very number of these varying statements, as well as their great discrepancy, the city of Rome must have been of very early origin; so early, in fact, as to have been almost lost amid the darkness of fable. But whence do we obtain the commonly received account?—We derive it from Fabius Pictor, who copied it from an obscure Greek author, Diocles the Peparethian; and from this tainted source have flowed all the stories concerning Mars, the Vestal, the Wolf, Romulus and Remus. Of Diocles we know nothing. Plutarch merely names him as the author whom Fabius was in the habit of following in most things. He adds that there were different ways of relating even the commonly received account of Diocles, and then proceeds to give its general outlines. The question here naturally presents itself, as to the degree of credit which is to be attached to the historical productions of Fabius Pictor. For if, as Plutarch informs us, Fabius was in the habit of following in most things the authority of Diocles, we may form a pretty satisfactory idea of the latter writer from the accounts which have come down to us respecting the qualifications and writings of the former. The reader will find under the article Fabius, a more detailed account of the historian than our present limits will allow us to give. It will be sufficient here to mention that, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Fabius had no better authority for the great proportion of events which preceded his own age than vulgar tradition. He probably found, that if he had confined himself to what was certain in these early times, his history would have been dry, insipid, and incomplete. This may have induced him to adopt the fables which the Greek historians had vented concerning the origin of Rome, and to insert whatever he found in the family traditions of the day, however contradictory or uncertain. Dionysius has also given many examples of his improbable narrations—his inconsistencies—his negligence in investigating the truth of what he relates as facts—and his inaccuracy in chronology. He remarks, moreover, that “so negligent had he been, and so little had he regarded ascertaining the truth of what he relates, that all not founded upon hearsay was taken from the Greek writers, who had little opportunity of being informed of Roman affairs, and had supplied their deficiency in real knowledge by the invention of fables.” This is the same Fabius, who, in the few unconnected fragments that remain of his Annals, tells us of a person who had a message brought him by a swallow; and of a party of loup-garous, who, after being transformed into wolves, recovered their own figures, and, what is more, got back their cast-off clothes, provided they had abstained for nine years from preying upon human flesh! So low, indeed, even among the Romans themselves, had the character of Fabius for historical fidelity fallen, that Polybius apologizes on one occasion for quoting Fabius as an authority. “It will perhaps be asked,” says he, “how I came to make mention of Fabius: It is not that I think his narration probable enough to deserve credit: what he writes is so absurd, and has so little the appearance of truth, that the reader will easily remark, without my taking notice of it, the little reliance which is to be placed on that author, whose inconsistency is palpable of itself.” Polybius also accuses him of gross partiality to his own nation in the account of the Punic war; and in particular charges him with falsehood in his statement of the causes of the second contest with the Carthaginians. It cannot but excite a good-humoured smile to see so many persons contending that the early history of Rome, as we have received it through the common channel, is decidedly genuine, and that any attempt to establish the opposite opinion betrays a spirit of sceptical incredulity deserving of severe reprehension, when the very historian on whose authority their whole superstructure depends is none other than Fabius Pictor! This same character for historical accuracy must fairly be assigned to Diocles the Peparethian; for if Fabius followed him in most things (ἐν τοῖς πλείστοις ἐθνολογίῃσι), and if Fabius be proved from his very narrative to have been a visionary, fabulous, and incorrect writer, his prototype Diocles must have been equally if not more so. As regards the fable of the wolf and the early preservation of Romulus and Remus, the explanation given by Heyne (Excurs. 4, ad Æn. 7.) is both ingenious and satisfactory.

That acute and profound scholar gives it as his opinion that the whole story respecting Romulus and Remus having been suckled by a wolf, took its rise from the name Roma having been derived by some from the old Latin word ruma or rumi, which is equivalent in force to the later form mamma, and signifies “the breast or pap.” Thus, ignorance of the true origin of the name gave rise to fanciful conjectures, and these conjectures in process of time became matters of sober history.—Thus much for the commonly received account of the origin of the imperial city. We propose now to offer one of a different, and, we hope, more satisfactory, character: one which will trace the foundation of Rome to a period long prior to the supposed era of Romulus; and which, advancing still farther, will show that Roma was not the true or Latin name of the city.—Among the cities of the Pelasgi, in the land once possessed by the Siculi, that is, in Latium, mention is frequently made of one denominated Saturnia. This city, thus known by the name of Saturnia, is no other than Rome itself. The following authorities will, it is conceived, sufficiently establish the point. Thus, Pliny, (3, c. 5,) observes, “Saturnia, where Rome now stands.” So Aurelius Victor (c. 3.) “Saturnia, built on one of the hills of Rome, was the residence of Saturn.” And Justin (43, c. 1.) “The mountain on which he (Saturn) dwell was called Saturnius, on which now stands the Roman capitol; Saturn being as it were displaced by Jove.” In like manner Ovid, (Fast. 6, v. 383.) makes Juno say, “Rome was formerly called Saturnia, after my father.” See also Varro, L. L. 4, c. 7. Saturnia itself is recognized as a very ancient city in the following passage of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (Ant. Rom. 1, c. 20.): “The Pelasgi together with the Aborigines, inhabited many cities, partly dwelt in previously by the Siculi, partly founded by themselves; such as Cære, which was at that time called Agylla, Pisa, Saturnia, Alsium, and some others.”—But by whom was Saturnia built? Was it of Pelasgic origin or founded by the ancient Siculi?—The following authority will furnish a satisfactory answer. Dionysius (1, c. 73,) quotes an old historian named Antiochus of Syracuse, (whom he styles at the same time “no common or recent writer,”) to the following effect: “Antiochus of Syracuse says that when Morges reigned in Italy there came to him from Rome, an exile named Sculus.” This passage is deserving of very close consideration. In the first place, as Morges, according to the same writer, succeeded Italus, and as the very name of this latter prince carries us back at once to the earliest periods of Italian history, we find the name Rome applied to a city which must of consequence have been one of the oldest in the land. In the next place, it is evident that Antiochus relates a fact not based upon his own individual knowledge, but upon an old and established tradition; for Antiochus brought down his history of Sicilian affairs to the 98th Olympiad, that is, to the 388th year before the Christian era, a period when neither he himself, nor any other Grecian writer knew aught of Rome, even by report, as a city actually in existence; since only two years previous (B. C. 390,) it had been burned by the Gauls, and it was not until more than a century afterwards that the Romans became known to the Sicilian Greeks by the capture of Tarentum. It would seem then that Rome (Roma) was the most ancient name, that it was displaced for a time by Saturnia, and was afterwards resumed. Saturnia was a religious appellation; the Saturnus of the Italians being, in fact, identical with the Kronos of the Pelasgi. The name Roma, on the other hand, appears to be derived from Rumon, the ancient appellation of the river Tiber, according to Servius (ad Æn. 3, v. 90.) The term Rumon, as applied to a river, is moreover strictly in unison with the principle of analogy that pervades in similar cases both the Celtic and Grecian tongues; as, for example, Rha, Rho, Rhu, Rhiu, Rhiw, Rhei, (ῥεω, ῥοος).—We will now enter more fully into the consideration of our subject, and endeavour to find other additional grounds for the support of the opinion which we are advocating. To the same region of Italy where Saturn had erected on the Capitoline mountain the city of Saturnia, and opposite to whom Janus had also established his residence on the Janiculum, came, according to Dionysius (1, c. 31), an individual named Evander, who was received in a friendly manner by the reigning monarch Faunus. Two ships were sufficient to carry him and his followers, and a mountain was assigned him as the place of his abode, where he built a small city, and called it Pallantium from his native city in Arcadia. This name became gradually corrupted into Palatium, while the mountain took the appellation of Mons Palatinus.—Thus far Dionysius. Now, that a mere stranger, with but a handful of followers, should be received in so friendly a manner by the Pelasgi and Aborigines, as to be allowed to settle in their immediate vicinity, and in a place too which was in a later age, as Dionysius informs us, the very heart of Rome, is scarcely entitled to belief. Still less is it to be credited that he wrested a settlement there by force. If then we are to retain this old tradition respecting Evander and his followers, (and we have nothing whatever which can authorize the rejection of it,) there are but two ways in which the whole can be explained. Either Evander was the leader of those very Pelasgi, who, uniting with the Aborigines, drove out the Siculi from Latium, and received for his portion the city of Rome with its adjacent territory; or he was a wandering Pelasgi, driven from Thessaly by the arms of the Hellenes, and after many unsuccessful attempts elsewhere, induced to come to Italy in quest of an abode. It becomes extremely difficult to decide between these two hypotheses, since they both receive considerable support from ancient authorities. The Pelasgi had already, on their very first irruption into Latium, founded a city called Pallantium in the territory of Reate, whose ancient situation Dionysius of Halicarnassus endeavours to point out. The name Pallantium was subsequently transferred by these same Pelasgi to the city of Rome, after they had become masters of it by the expulsion of the Siculi. Varro speaks in very express terms on this subject (L. L. 4, c. 8.) "The inhabitants of the territory of Reate, named Palatini, settled on the Roman Palatium." A passage of Festus, moreover, (v. Sacrani) is fully to the point: "The Sacrani, natives of Reate, (i. e. the territory) drove the Ligures and Siculi from Septimontio (i. e. Rome)." After reading this passage there surely can be no doubt remaining in our minds as to the early existence of the city of Rome, as well as of its occupation by a band of Pelasgi and Aborigines. It is curious, moreover, to compare the name Sacrani (which evidently means "sacred, or consecrated, to some deity") with the acknowledged fact of the Pelasgi being a sacerdotal caste or order; as well as with the circumstance of there being a class of priests at Ardea, called Sacrani, who worshipped Cybele, a goddess whose worship is most clearly traced from the East. On the supposition then that Evander was the leader of the Pelasgi, we are enabled to clear up the old tradition of his having introduced into Italy the use of letters, and the knowledge of various arts; for we have endeavoured to show in a previous article (vid. Pelasgi) that the Greeks also were indebted to the Pelasgi for an acquaintance with written characters, and with many of the arts of civilized life. And hence, too, may we satisfactorily remove the difficulty which confronts our theory respecting Evander, in the pages of Pliny (7, c. 56,) when he ascribes the introduction of letters into Italy to the Pelasgi race. If Evander were an Arcadian Greek, and at a time too when the Pelasgi were far superior to the Greeks in knowledge and refinement, how could he be the instructor of the latter, especially in so important and essential a particular? To those who are not unwilling to indulge in etymological speculations, the fable respecting Hercules, Cacus, and Evander, will appear somewhat confirmatory of the theory which has been advanced. The names of Evander and Cacus (in Greek, Ευανδρος and Κακος,) seem to be nothing more than appellations intended to characterize the individuals to whom they are applied: thus, Evander, the leader of the Pelasgi, the head and chief of this division of that great sacerdotal caste, and consequently, to apply a modern term, the high-priest of the order, is the Good Man (Ευανδρος), and Cacus, his opponent, is the Bad Man (Κακος). Hercules destroys Cacus; that is, the Religion of the Sun, or some other Oriental system of belief, (vid. Ritter's Vorhalle, p. 343. seq.) professed by the Pelasgi, was made to supplant some rude and probably cruel form of worship which had been followed by the Siculi; and as Evander was high-priest of the one, so Cacus, whoever he was, may be regarded as the head of the other. The second hypothesis stated above, namely, that Evander was a wandering Pelasgus who had come to Italy in quest of an abode, and had been hospitably received by those of his nation who were already established there, receives in its turn an air of great probability, from the concurrent testimony of all the ancient writers as to his having come to Italy by sea, as well as from the circumstance so explicitly stated, that he arrived in two ships with his band of followers. If now we turn our attention for a moment to the fact mentioned in a previous article (vid. Hetruria), that after the Hellenes had driven the Pelasgi from Thessaly, a portion of the latter retired into Epirus, while another part sailed to the western coast of Asia Minor, where Homer speaks of them as the allies of the Trojans; if, in addition to this, we call to mind what is stated in the same article, that both divisions eventually settled in Italy, and laid the foundation of the Etrurian confederacy; and if, finally, we take into consideration what Plutarch tells us in his life of Romulus, (though he assigns no authority for it,) that Romus, king of the Latins, drove out of the city the Tyrrheni, who had come from Thessaly to Lydia, and from Lydia to Italy, the balance preponderates considerably in favour of this second hypothesis. Perhaps, however, they may both be reconciled together by supposing that those of the Pelasgi who had come from the upper part of Italy, had changed the name of ancient Rome to that of Palatium, and that Evander came to, and was received among, them. It is most probable that Evander was one of the leaders of the Pelasgi from the coast of Asia, and bore a part in the founding of the Etrurian republic. As to the assertion of Dionysius that Evander was an Arcadian, it involves no contradiction at all to what has just been advanced, for Dionysius is one of those who derive the origin of the Pelasgi from the province of Arcadia. Others make him an Argive, but then they confound Argos Pelasgicum, the head of the Pelasgic confederacy in Thessaly, with Argos in the Peloponnese.—Thus much for the origin of Rome. The question now arises as to the actual existence of Romulus. In order to answer this satisfactorily we must go a little into detail. In the district of Latium, there were, exclusive of Rome, many cities of the Aborigines or Latins, who had settled in this part of the country together with the Pelasgi. Of these Alba Longa was the most powerful. Through internal dissensions, and from the operation of other causes, the Pelasgi had lost in most places out of Etruria their original ascendancy. A leader from Alba Longa, with a band of voluntary followers, conducted an enterprize against Rome, where the power of the Pelasgi was in like manner fast diminishing; the enterprize succeeded. The conqueror became king of the ancient city, and increased its inhabitants by the number of his followers. The Pelasgi remained, but they no longer enjoyed their former power. Whether two brothers or only a single individual conducted the enterprize, whether they were previously named Romulus and Remus (i. e. Romus), or, what is far more probable, received these appellations from the conquered city, is a point on which we cannot decide. That its most ancient name, however, was Valentia, and that Evander translated this into the corresponding Greek form Παύλον, as Solinus asserts, can be credited by no one. From the theory thus established many important inferences may be drawn which will tend to throw light on certain obscure parts of early Roman History. 1. We cease to wonder at the successful resistance which Rome, apparently in her very infancy, offered to her powerful neighbours; for even at this early period, the city must be regarded as of remote and ancient origin. 2. We understand very clearly why Tuscan troops formed one of the wings of the army of Romulus; for there is very strong probability that they were in reality the old Tyrrhenian or Pelasgic inhabitants, and that Cœles Vibenna, their leader, was in truth the Lucumo, or Ruler, of Rome at the time of its capture by Romulus. The grounds on which this probability rests for support are, the fact of one of the hills of Rome having been assigned as an abode to Vibenna and his followers; of one of the three earliest tribes (and the very one which comprehended all those of the inhabitants who were not followers of Romulus nor Sabines) being called Luceres, after Lucumo, his old Etrurian title of magistracy; and, what is strongest of all, because his followers did not leave the city on his death, but continued to dwell therein, and, according to Varro (L. L. 4, c. 8), were compelled eventually to remove from the hill to the plain, because their original situation on the Cœlian mount was too strongly fortified, and they themselves were suspected of disaffection to the state. 3. We perceive also the meaning of the Etrurian writer Volumnus, quoted by Varro, (L. L. 4, c. 9), when he states that the three appellations for the early Roman tribes, Ramnes and Tatienses, as well as Luceres, are all Etrurian terms; the preponderating language in Rome at the time of its capture being Tyrrhenian or Etrurian. 4. We can comprehend the close union and intercourse which subsisted at a later period between the Romans and Etrurians, Rome being, in fact, an Etrurian city. 5. The account no longer appears exaggerated of Romulus having only 3000 foot and 300 horse when he founded Rome, and of their being 46,000 foot and 1000 horse at the period of his death; the former means the forces which accompanied him on his enterprize against the ancient city, the latter were the combined strength of his followers and the ancient inhabitants. 6. We see, too, what to many has appeared altogether inexplicable, how the Roman kings, during their continual wars, were yet able to cherish at home the taste for building, which never can exist among a rude and early community: how it was, that, even at this remote period, the Cloacæ, the Circus Maximus, the Capitol, and other public constructions were undertaken and accomplished. These stupendous structures, altogether beyond the resources of Rome if she is to be considered as an infant state at the time of their execution, were, in fact, the work of the Etrurian part of the population of Rome: the old inhabitants were employed on them, in order that amid employments of such kind their attention might be called off from public affairs. These works were executed by them in the Etrurian taste, of massive architecture, and the Cloacæ still in part remain, a monument of the remote existence of Rome. 7. We discover the reason of the most distinguished of the Roman youth being sent to the principal Etrurian cities for the purposes of education: it was done in fact from motives of state policy, in order that amid the tumult of almost incessant wars, they might still keep alive that spark of early knowledge and refinement which had distinguished Rome from the very outset, and which marks her not as the receptacle of a horde of banditti, but as an ancient and civilized city, falling by right of conquest into the hands of a military chieftain. 8. We are enabled to discover many of the secret springs which impelled the complicated and apparently discordant machinery of the Roman government. The old inhabitants being much farther advanced in civilization than their conquerors, would naturally, even after the fall of the city, be respected by the victors for their superior improvement, and the most distinguished of them would be called, from motives of policy, to some slight participation in the affairs of the government. Accordingly we find that almost one of the first acts of Romulus was the institution of a senate, whose limited number freed him from any apprehensions of their combining to overthrow his power, while their confirmation of his decrees, in case it should be needed, would have great weight with the old population of the city. The impolitic neglect which Romulus subsequently displayed towards this order ended in his destruction. That such indeed was his fate, and that the senate were privy to the whole affair, admits of no doubt when we call to mind the monstrous falsehood asserted by the senator Proculus Julius for the purpose of freeing that body from the suspicion of having taken the life of the king. After all that has been said, we hazard little if any thing in asserting, that the early Roman nobility were the descendants of a sacred or sacerdotal caste. That the Pelasgi were such an order has been frequently asserted, and we trust satisfactorily established, in previous articles. The Etrurians, descendants of the Pelasgi, preserved this singular feature in the form of government which they had adopted. The Etrurian confederacy was composed indeed of twelve independent cities, yet the government was by no means in the hands of the people: it was the patrimony of an hereditary caste, who were at once invested with the military power, and charged with the sacerdotal functions. This strange form of government threw the whole power into the hands of the higher classes, who were, no doubt, the immediate descendants of the Pelasgi, and subjected to their controul the whole mass of the lower orders, who very probably were sprung from the early Aborigines. Now, reasoning by analogy, we must allow this very same form of government to have prevailed in Etrurian Rome before its conquest by Romulus. This arrangement would throw into the hands of the upper classes the chief power, and give them the absolute controul of religious affairs; and, on his capture of the city, Romulus would leave them in full possession of the latter as a matter almost of necessity, while from motives of policy he would allow them to retain a small portion of the former. Hence the origin of the Roman nobility. Many circumstances combine to strengthen what has just been advanced. The nobility had for a long time in Rome the sole custody of religious affairs, and from their order all the priests were for a long series of years constantly chosen. Every patrician gens, and each individual patrician family, had certain sacred rites peculiar to itself, which went by inheritance in the same manner as effects, and which the heir was bound to perform. Even in a later age, when the power of the popular branch had become almost paramount, the senate still assumed to themselves the guardianship and controul of all religious affairs. In this way, too, is to be explained the relation of patron and client, which in the earlier days of the Roman government was observed with so much formality and rigour. It was an artful arrangement on the part of a sacerdotal order; and may be regarded as analogous to, and no doubt derived from, the institution of castes in India. Its object was to keep the lower orders in complete dependence upon the higher, and to effect this end the terrors of religion were powerfully annexed: it was deemed unlawful for patrons and clients to accuse, or bear witness against, each other; and whoever was found to have acted otherwise, might be slain with impunity as a victim devoted to Pluto and the infernal gods. A regular system of castes seems thus to have prevailed in Rome both before, and a long period after, its conquest by Romulus. The possession of superior knowledge formed a powerful instrument in accomplishing such a result, but the most effectual means undoubtedly were the entire engrossing, on the part of the patricians, of every thing connected with the rites and ceremonies of religion. The accessions that were constantly making to the numbers of the inhabitants by the influx of strangers and conquered tribes, would gradually weaken this hereditary, and, as it were, patriarchal influence of the patrician order, by introducing a race of men sprung, in a great measure, from the Aborigines of the country, and equally averse to the sacerdotal sway and the hereditary prerogatives of the nobility. As soon as the body of the Roman commons began to assume this chequered and diversified character, that instant dissensions arose between the two orders of the state. The nobility tried every method to extend their ancient influence and power over the more recent portion of the inhabitants, and the latter as strenuously contended for exemption from their controul. The first indications of this independent spirit on the part of the plebeians showed themselves during the interregnum which preceded the reign of Numa, when the patricians made so powerful an effort to regain their former ascendancy; and it is worthy of observation how politic the conduct of the higher orders was, in unanimously recommending Numa to fill the vacant throne, and how fully that monarch, who there is every reason to believe had been educated in Etruria, seconded the views of the nobility, in multiplying and confining exclusively to that order the ceremonies and observances of religion. After the expulsion of Tarquin, the struggle for mastery was renewed; and a preconcerted plan seems to have been set on foot by the patricians of involving the lower orders in their debt, and of wresting from them, by means of the influence which they would thus acquire, what open violence could never have obtained. The plan, however, failed. The secession to the Sacred Mount shows that the commons had now learned to put their own machinery in operation against their oppressors; and in this way also are we to explain the remarkable fact of the Comitia Tributa, where the people had the majority, not requiring, like the other Comitia, the previous taking of auspices; for the people had become aware that such a preliminary step would have enabled the patricians to put off any assembly at pleasure by falsifying the omens.—But our limits forbid any farther comments on this interesting subject. The only point that remains for our consideration is the one mentioned in the early part of these remarks, namely, with regard to the true or Latin name of the Roman city. Macrobius (3, c. 9,) informs us, that the Romans, when they besieged a city and thought themselves sure of taking it, used solemnly to call out the tutelary gods of the place, either because they thought that the place could not otherwise be taken, or because they regarded it as impious to hold the gods in captivity. “On this account,” he adds, “the Romans themselves have willed that both the deity under whose protection Rome is, as well as the Latin name of the city, remain secret and undivulged. The name of the city is unknown even to the most learned; the Romans being on their guard against mentioning it, lest they themselves might suffer what they had often put in practice against their enemies, and lest their tutelary deity might be evoked.” To the testimony of Macrobius may be added that of Pliny (3, c. 5), “Rome, whose other name it is forbidden by the secret ceremonies of religion to divulge.” Now, in the sanctuary of Vesta was preserved the Palladium, “the fated pledge of Roman dominion” (Fatale pignus imperii Romani. Liv. 26, c. 27.) May we not then suppose Pallas or Minerva to have been the true tutelary deity of Rome, and the real or Latin name of the city to have been Pallantium? This would bring us back to the ancient name imposed by the Pelasgi. That the Palladium was the statue of Pallas will clearly appear from numerous ancient authorities. A few may be here cited. Thus, Eustathius remarks, “The statues of Pallas are called by the ancients Palladia.” So Apollodorus, “This (the Palladium) fell from heaven, and was delivered up to king Ilus. Its size was three cubits; it was in the attitude of one advancing, holding in the right hand an uplifted spear, in the left a spindle and distaff.” There are also remaining ancient coins, on which Æneas is represented bearing on his shoulders his parent Anchises, and in his right hand a small image of Pallas. Lucan uses very express terms; “And Pallas seen by no one of men, the memorable pledge in the secret shrine.” The same poet, in speaking of the chief Vestal, says, “to whom alone it is allowed to behold the Trojan Minerva.” It is curious to observe, moreover, that the Palladium and the worship of fire are always connected together, which would seem to make the belief respecting the Palladium, of Pelasgic or Oriental origin.

ROMŪLA, a name given to the fig-tree under which Romulus and Remus were found. Ovid. 2, Fast. v. 412.

ROMŪLIDÆ, a patronymic given to the Roman people from Romulus their first king, and the founder of their city. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 638.

ROMŪLUS, a son of Mars and Ilia, grandson of Numitor king of Alba, was born at the same birth with Remus. [vid. preceding remarks.] These two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who usurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preserved, and according to Florus, the river stopped its course, and a she-wolf came and fed them with her milk till they were found by Faustulus, one of the king's shepherds, who educated them as his own children. When they knew their real origin, the twins, called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and to determine which of the two brothers should have the management of it they had recourse to omens and the flight of birds. Remus went to Mount Aventine, and Romulus to Mount Palatine. Remus saw first a flight of six vultures, and soon after, Romulus, twelve; and therefore, as his number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, hoping that it would become a warlike and powerful nation, as the birds from which he had received the omen were fond of prey and slaughter. Romulus marked with a furrow the place where he wished to erect the walls; but their slenderness was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greatest contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants; but Romulus, by making an asylum of a sacred grove, soon collected a multitude of fugitives, foreigners, and criminals, whom he received as his lawful subjects. Yet, however numerous these might be, they were despised by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connections with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honour of the god Consus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had assembled there to be spectators of these unusual exhibitions. These violent measures offended the neighbouring nations; they made war against the ravishers with various success, till at last they entered Rome, which had been betrayed to them by one of the stolen virgins. A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered, or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had rushed between the two armies, and by their tears and entreaties raised compassion in the bosoms of their parents and husbands. The Sabines left their original possessions, and came to live in Rome, where Tatius, their king, shared the sovereign power with Romulus. The introduction of the Sabines into the city of Rome was attended with the most salutary consequences, and the Romans, by pursuing this plan, and admitting the conquered nations among their citizens, rendered themselves more powerful and more formidable. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conquest; one part was reserved for religious uses, to maintain the priests, to erect temples, and to consecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expenses of the state; and the third part was equally distributed among his subjects, who were divided into three classes or tribes. The most aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were also chosen, whom the monarch might consult in matters of the highest importance, and from their age they were called senators, and from their authority patres. The whole body of the people was also distinguished by the name of patricians and plebeians, patron and client, who by mutual interest were induced to preserve the peace of the state, and to promote the public good. Some time after Romulus disappeared as he was giving instructions to the senators, and the eclipse of the sun, which happened at that time, was favourable to the rumour which asserted that the king had been taken up to heaven, 714 B. C. after a reign of 39 years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the senators, who solemnly declared, that as he returned from Alba, he had seen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honours under the name of Quirinus, and to assure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of the world. This report was immediately credited, and the more so, as the senators dreaded the resentment of the people, who suspected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raised to him, and a regular priest, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him sacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the 12 great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received such distinguished honours, when the Romans considered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the son of the god of war. He is generally represented like his father, so much that it is difficult to distinguish them. The fable of the two children of Rhea Sylvia being nourished by a she-wolf arose from Lupa, Faustulus's wife, having brought them up. (vid. Acca.) *Dionys. ROSIANUM, the port of Thurii, now Rossano.

Q. ROSCIUS, a Roman actor, [from his surname Gallus supposed to have been a native of Gaul, north of the Po, although educated in the vicinity of Lanuvium and Aricia.] He was so celebrated on the stage, that every comedian of excellence and merit has received his name. [Cicero, in his work on divination, makes his brother Quintus say that the young Roscius was found one night in his cradle, enveloped in the folds of two serpents; that his father having consulted the auspices respecting this prodigy, they told him that his child would attain unto great celebrity. Quintus adds that a certain Praxiteles had represented this in sculpture, and that the poet Archias had celebrated it in song.] His eyes were naturally distorted, and he always appeared on the stage with a mask, but the Romans obliged him to act his characters without, and they overlooked the deformities of his face that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation, and be delighted with the sweetness of his voice. He was accused on suspicion of dishonourable practices; but Cicero undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aspersions of his enemies, in an elegant oration still extant. [Valerius Maximus (8, c. 7,) states, that Roscius studied with the greatest care the most trifling gesture which he was to make in public, and Cicero relates, that though the house of this comedian was a kind of school where good actors were formed, yet Roscius declared that he never had a pupil with whom he was completely satisfied. If Plutarch be correctly informed, Cicero himself studied under this great actor; he was certainly his friend and admirer. Macrobius (Sat. 2, c. 10.) informs us that Cicero and Roscius sometimes tried which of the two could express a thought more forcibly, the one by his words, or the other by his gestures, and that these exercises gave Roscius so high an opinion of his art that he wrote a work, in which he made a comparison between it and eloquence. The same author mentions that Sylla, the dictator, to testify his admiration, sent the actor a gold ring, a symbol of equestrian rank. His daily profits were 1000 denarii (nearly one hundred and eighty dollars.) According to Pliny his annual gains were about twenty thousand dollars of our currency. Roscius died about 62 B. C. for, in Cicero's defence of Archias, which was delivered A. U. 693, the death of Roscius is alluded to as a recent event.] *Horat. 2, ep. 1. — Quintil. — Cic. pro Ros. de orat. 3, de Div. 1, &c. — Tusc. 3, &c. — Plut. in Cic. — Sextus, a rich citizen of Ameria, murdered in the dictatorship of Sylla. RUBICON, [a small stream of Italy, falling into the Adriatic a little to the north of Ariminum, and forming in part the northern boundary of Italia Propria. It was on this last account that it was forbidden the Roman generals to pass the Rubicon with an armed force, under the most dreadful imprecations; for in violating this injunction they would enter on the immediate territory of the Republic, and would be in effect declaring war upon their country. Cæsar crossed this stream with his army at the commencement of the civil war, and harangued his troops at Ariminum. When Augustus subsequently included Gallia Cisalpina within the limits of Italy, the Rubicon sank in importance; and in modern times it is difficult to ascertain the position of the true stream. D'Anville makes it correspond with a current which, formed of three brooks, is called at its mouth Fiumesino. A formal papal decree, however, issued in 1756, decided in favour of the Lusa; but popular tradition designates the Pisatello as the true stream, and this river best suits the account we have of the situation of the Rubicon.] Lucan. 1, v. 185 and 213. — Strab. 5. — Suet. in Cæs. 32. — Plin. 3, c. 15.

Theodosius to the dreadful massacre of Thesalonica. After the death of this monarch, he succeeded to absolute authority over the eastern empire, in the reign of Arcadius. He soon, however, fell beneath the power of Stilicho, general under Honorius in the western empire, and was put to death by the army. He is said to have aspired to the supreme authority.]

RUFRIUM, a town of Samnium, now Ruvo. Liv. 8, c. 25.

RUFUS, a Latin historian. [vid. Quintius.]—One of the ancestors of Sylla, degraded from the rank of a senator because ten pounds weight of gold was found in his house.

RUTENI, a people of Gaul, now Ruvergne, in Guienne. Cæs. B. G.

P. RUTILIUS RUFUS, a Roman consul in the age of Sylla, celebrated for his virtues and writings. He refused to comply with the requests of his friends because they were unjust. When Sylla had banished him from Rome he retired to Smyrna, amidst the acclamations and praises of the people; and when some of his friends wished him to be recalled home by means of a civil war, he severely reprimanded them, and said, that he wished rather to see his country blush at his exile, than to plunge it into distress by his return. He was the first who taught the Roman soldiers the principles of fencing, and by thus mixing dexterity with valour, rendered their attacks more certain, and more irresistible. During his banishment he employed his time in study, and wrote an history of Rome in Greek, and an account of his own life in Latin, besides many other works. *Ovid. RUTŪLI, a people of Latium, known as well as the Latins, by the name of Aborigines. SARACHUS, or SABACON, a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt and reigned there, after the expulsion of king Amasis. After a reign of 50 years he was terrified by a dream and retired into his own kingdom. SABAZIUS, a surname of Bacchus, as also of Jupiter. Cic. de N. D. 3, c. 23.—Ærnob. 4.

SABELLI, a people of Italy, descended from the Sabines, or, according to some, from the Samnites. They inhabited that part of the country which lies between the Sabines and the Marsi. Hence the epithet of Sabellicus. Horat. 3, od. 6.—Virg. G. 3, v. 255.

SABELLUS, a Latin poet in the reign of Domitian and Nerva.

JULIA SABINA, a Roman matron, who married Adrian by means of Plotina the wife of Trajan. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues. Adrian treated her with the greatest asperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple; and the empress was so sensible of his unkindness, that she boasted in his presence that she had disdained to make him a father lest his children should become more odious or more tyrannical than he himself was. The behaviour of Sabina at last so exasperated Adrian that he poisoned her, or, according to some, obliged her to destroy herself. The emperor at that time laboured under a mortal disease, and therefore he was the more encouraged to sacrifice Sabina to his resentment, that she might not survive him. Divine honours were paid to her memory. She died after she had been married 38 years to Adrian, A. D. 138.

SABINI, an ancient people of Italy, reckoned among the Aborigines, or those inhabitants whose origin was not known. [Strabo is one of those who regard the Sabines as Autochthones, or of aboriginal extraction. In the district where the Sabines were afterwards settled, the Aborigines, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (2, p. 112.) had established themselves in very early times. Another proof is to be found in the language of the Sabine race, which was in its principal features identical with that spoken by the Aborigines in Latium. On the ground of an affinity between these two nations, we perceive in an instant why the Sabines were invited to Rome in the days of Romulus to attend the celebration of the games. And again, unless the Sabines and the Latins under Romulus spoke the same language, how could they possibly unite in the same city?] The possessions of the Sabines were situated in the neighbourhood of Rome, between the river Nar and the Anio, and bounded on the north by the Appenines, and Umbria, south by Latium, east by the Marsi, and Etruria on the west. The greatest part of the contiguous nations were descended from them, such as the Umbrians, the Campanians, the Sabelli, the Osci, Samnites, Hernici, Æqui, Marsi, Brutii, &c. The Sabines are celebrated in ancient history as being the first who took up arms against the Romans to avenge the rape of their females at a spectacle where they had been invited. After some engagements, the greatest part of the Sabines left their ancient possessions, and migrated to Rome, where they settled with their new allies. They were at last totally subdued, about the year of Rome 273, and ranked as Roman citizens. Their chief cities were Cures, Fidena, Reate, Crustumium, Corniculum, Nomentum, Collatia, &c. The character of the nation for chastity, for purity of morals, and for the knowledge of herbs and incantations was very great. Horat. 17, ep. 28.—*Cic. SABINIĀNUS, a general who revolted in Africa, in the reign of Gordian, and was defeated soon after, A. D. 240.—A general of the eastern empire, &c.

SABINUS AULUS, a Latin poet intimate with Ovid. He wrote some epistles and elegies, in the number of which were mentioned an epistle from Æneas to Dido, from Hippolytus to Phædra, from Jason to Hipsipyle, from Demophon to Phyllis, from Paris to Enone, and from Ulysses to Penelope; the three last of which, though said to be his composition, are spurious. Ovid. Am. 2, el. 18, v. 27.—A man from whom the Sabines received their name. He received divine honours after death, and was one of those deities whom Æneas invoked when he entered Italy. He was supposed to be of Lacedæmonian origin. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 171.—Julius, an officer, who proclaimed himself emperor in the beginning of Vespasian's reign. He was soon after defeated in a battle; and to escape from the conqueror he hid himself in a subterranean cave, with two faithful domestics, where he continued unseen for nine successive years. His wife found out his retreat, and spent her time with him, till her frequent visits to the cave discovered the place of his concealment. He was dragged before Vespasian, and by his orders put to death, though his friends interested themselves in his cause, and his wife endeavoured to raise the emperor's pity, by showing him the twins whom she had brought forth in their subterranean retreat.—Titius, a Roman senator shamefully accused and condemned by Sejanus. His body, after execution, was dragged through the streets of Rome, and treated with the greatest indignities. His dog constantly followed the body, and when it was thrown into the Tiber, the faithful animal plunged in after it and was drowned. Plin. 8, c. 40.—Poppæus, a Roman consul who presided above 24 years over Mœsia, and obtained a triumph for his victories over the Barbarians. He was a great favourite of Augustus and of Tiberius. Tacit. Ann.—Flavius, a brother of Vespasian, killed by the populace. He was well known for his fidelity to Vitellius. He commanded in the Roman armies 35 years, and was governor of Rome for 12.—A Roman who attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews.

SABIS, now Sambre, a river of Belgic Gaul, falling into the Maese at Namur. Cæs. 2, c. 16 and 18.

SABRĀTA, a maritime town of Tripolis in Africa, south-east of Syrtis Minor. It is now Sabari or Old Tripoli. Ital. 3, v. 256.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

SABRĪNA, the Severn in England.

SACĀDAS, a musician and poet of Argos, who obtained three several times the prize at the Pythian games. Phil. de mus.—Paus. 6, c. 14.

SACÆ, a people of Scythia, who inhabited the country that lies at the east of Bactriana and Sogdiana, and towards the north of Mount Imaus, [now Saketa.] The name of Sacæ was given in general to all the Scythians by the Persians. [The term Sacæ signifies "dogs." It was applied by the Persians to the Scythians on account of the latter following a different religious creed from their own. The Scythian religion seems to have been derived from the worship of Buddha in India.] They had no towns, according to some writers, but lived in tents. Ptol. 6, c. 13.—Herodot. 3, c. 93, 1. 7, c. 63.—Plin. 6, c. 17.—Salin. 62.

SACER MONS, a mountain near Rome. vid. Mons Sacer.

SACER PORTUS, or SACRI PORTUS, a place of Italy, near Præneste, famous for a battle that was fought there between Sylla and Marius, in which the former obtained the victory. Paterc. 2, c. 26.—Lucan. 2, v. 134.

SACRA VIA, a celebrated street at Rome, where a treaty of peace and alliance was made between Romulus and Tatius. It led from the amphitheatre to the capitol, by the temple of the goddess of peace and the temple of Cæsar. The triumphal processions passed through it to go to the capitol. Horat. 4, od. 2, l. 1, sat. 9.—Liv. 2, c. 13.—Cic. Planc. 7. Att. 4, ep. 3.

SACRATA LĒX, militaris, A. U. C. 411, by the dictator Valerius Corvus, as some suppose, enacted that the name of no soldier which had been entered on the muster roll should be struck out but by his consent, and that no person who had been a military tribune should execute the office of duetor ordinum.

SACRUM BELLUM, a name given to the wars carried on concerning the temple of Delphi. The first began B. C. 448, and in it the Athenians and Lacedæmonians were auxiliaries on opposite sides. The second war began 357 B. C. and finished nine years after by Philip of Macedonia, who destroyed all the cities of the Phocians. [vid. Phocis.]—Promontorium, a promontory of Spain, now Cape St. Vincent, called by Strabo the most westerly part of the earth. [It was called Sacrum, because the ancients believed this to be the place where the Sun at his setting plunged his chariot into the sea.]

SADYĀTES, one of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia 12 years after his father Gyges. He made war against the Milesians for six years. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.

SĒTABIS, a town of Spain, [on a little river which falls into the Suero. It was famed for its fine linen, and is now Xativa.] Sil. 3, v. 373.

SAGĀNA, a woman acquainted with magic and enchantments. Horat. epod. 5, v. 25.

SAGĀRIS. [vid. Sungaris]

SAGRA, a small river of Italy in the country of the Brutii. [vid. Locri.] Cic. Nat. D. 2, c. 2.—Strab. 6.

SAGUNTUM, or SAGUNTUS, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, [north of Valentia,] about one mile from the sea-shore. It had been founded by a colony of Zacynthians, and by some of the Rutuli of Ardea. Saguntum is celebrated for the clay in its neighbourhood, with which cups, pocula Saguntina, were made, but more particularly it is famous as being the cause of the second Punic war, and for the attachment of its inhabitants to the interests of Rome. Hannibal took it after a siege of four months; and the inhabitants, not to fall into the enemy's hands, burnt themselves with their houses, and with all their effects. The conqueror afterwards rebuilt it, and placed a garrison there with all the noblemen whom he detained as hostages from the several neighbouring nations of Spain. [It was wrested from the Carthaginians by Scipio, and being greatly favoured by the Romans became a flourishing city. At some period, not mentioned in history, it was reduced to ruins. Some remains of it are still to be seen under the name of Murviadro, a corruption of Muri Veteres.] Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv. 21, c. 2, 7, 9.—Sal. 1, v. 271.—Lucan. 3, v. 250.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.

SAIS, a town in the Delta of Egypt, situated between the Canopic and Sebennytic mouths of the Nile, anciently the capital of Lower Egypt. Osiris was buried near the town of Sais. The inhabitants were called Saitæ. [This place is by some supposed to be the Sin of the Scriptures, but it is obviously recognized in Sall. There are still considerable remains on this spot. Minerva was worshipped at Sais with great solemnity.] Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, &c.

SALAMINIA, a name given to a ship at Athens which was employed by the republic in conveying the officers of state to their different administrations abroad, &c.—A name given to the island of Cyprus, on account of Salamis, one of its capital cities.

SĀLĀMIS, a daughter of the river Asopus, by Methrone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an island of the Ægean, which afterwards bore her name, and where she gave birth to a son called Cenchreus. Diod. 4.

SĀLĀMIS, SALAMINS, or SALAMĪNA, now Colouri, an island on the Saronicus Sinus, [now the gulf of Engia,] on the southern coast of Attica, opposite Eleusis, at the distance of about a league, with a town and harbour of the same name. It is about 50 miles in circumference. It was originally peopled by a colony of Ionians, and afterwards by some of the Greeks from the adjacent islands and countries. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the fleets of the Greeks and that of the Persians, when Xerxes invaded Attica. The enemy's ships amounted to above 2000, and those of the Peloponnesians to about 300 sail. In this engagement, which was fought on the 20th of October, B. C. 480, the Greeks lost 40 ships, and the Persians about 200, besides an immense number which were taken, with all they contained. [The island of Salamis was anciently called Cyceria, from Cychræus, the name of its first king, and also Pityusa from the number of pines found there. Strabo gives it the appellation of Scirias from an ancient hero of that name. It was called Salamine, from the nymph Salamis mentioned above.] It is said that Xerætes attempted to join it to the continent. Teucer and Ajax, who went to the Trojan war, were natives of Salamis. Strab. 2. Herodot. 8. c. 56, &c.—Plut. & C. Nep.—Them. &c.—Diod. 4.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 35, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Lucan. 5, v. 109.—Sil. 14, v. 283.

SĀLĀMIS, or SĀLĀMĪNA, a town at the east of the island of Cyprus. It was built by Teucer, who gave it the name of the island Salamis, from which he had been banished about 1270 years before the Christian era; and from this circumstance the epithets of ambigua and of altera were applied to it, as the mother country was also called rera, for the sake of distinction. His descendants continued masters of the town for above 800 years. It was destroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt in the 4th century, and called Constantia. [It was depopulated about the end of the 7th century; but the name of Constantza remains annexed to its ruins.] Strab. 9.—Herodot. 8, c. 94, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 21.—Patere. 1, c. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 183.

SĀLĀPIA, or SĀLĀPIÆ, now Salpe, a town of Apulia, [a short distance west of the Aufidus. Its situation was marshy and insalubrious. It was a post of consequence, and was eagerly contended for by the Romans and Carthaginians during the second Punic war.] Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Val. Max. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

SALARIA, a street and gate at Rome which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, because salt (sal) was generally conveyed to Rome that way. Mart. 4. ep. 64.—A bridge called Salarius, was built four miles from Rome through the Salarian gate on the river Anio.

SALASSI, [a people of Gallia Transpadana, more northerly than the Taurini, in a fine valley watered by the Duria Major.] They cut off 10,000 Romans under Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 610, and were soon after defeated, and at last totally subdued and sold as slaves by Augustus. [A colony of Prætorians was established in this territory in the reign of Augustus, which took the name of Augusta Prætoria, now Avusta.] Liv. 21, c. 38.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

SALEIUS, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illustrious parents, and distinguished by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv. 7, c. 80.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

SALENTINI, a people of Italy, [in Japygia, on the south-western side of the heel.] Ital. 8, v. 579.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 400.—Varro de R. R. 1, c. 24.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

SALERNUM, now Salerno, a town of the Picentini, on the shores of the Tyrrhene Sea, south of Campania, and famous for a medical school in the lower ages. Plin. 13, c. 3.—Liv. 34, c. 45.—Lucan. 2, v. 425.—Patere. 1, c. 15.—Horat. 1, ep. 15.

SALII, a college of priests at Rome, instituted in honour of Mars, and appointed by Numa to take care of the sacred shields called Ancylia, B. C. 709. (vid. Ancyle.) They were twelve in number. [Their chief was called Præsul, who seems to have gone foremost in the procession; their principal musician rates; and he who admitted new members, magister.] Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullus Hostilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in consequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honourable. The first of March was the day on which the Salii observed their festivals in honour of Mars. They were generally dressed in a short scarlet tunic, of which only the edges were seen; they wore a large purple-coloured belt about the waist, which was fastened with brass buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets with two corners standing up, and they wore in their right hand a small rod, and in their left a small buckler, [one of the Ancylia, or shields of Mars. Lucan says that it hung from the neck.] In the observation of their solemnity they first offered sacrifices, and afterwards went through the streets dancing in measured motions, sometimes all together, or at other times separately, while musical instruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and struck with their rods the shields which they held in their hands. They also sung hymns in honour of the gods, particularly of Mars, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themselves, and called Salicæ. [We have in Varro a few fragments of the Salian hymns, which even in the time of that writer were scarcely intelligible. Thus, for example, “Divum exta cante, Divum Deo suppliciter cante.”

i. e. Deorum exta canite, Deorum Deo (Jano) suppliciter canite: and also the following:

“————— omnia
*dapatilia comisse jani cusiones
duonus ceruses divius janusque venit.*”

i. e. Omnia dapaalia comedisse Jani Curiones. Bonus creator Divius Janusque venit.] The Salii instituted by Numa, were called Palatini, in contradistinction from the others, because they lived on Mount Palatine, and offered their sacrifices there. Those that were added by Tullus were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the same name, where they had fixed their residence. Their name seems to have been derived a saliendo, or sallando, because, during their festivals, it was particularly requisite that they should leap and dance. Their feasts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and sumptuous, whence dapes saliares is proverbially applied to such feasts as are most splendid and costly. It was usual among the Romans, when they declared war, for the Salii to shake their shields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their assistance. Liv. 1, c. 20.—

CRISPUS SALLUSTIUS, a Latin historian, born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He received his education at Rome, and made himself known as a public magistrate in the office of quæstor. His licentiousness and the depravity of his manners, however, did not escape the censure of the age, and Sallust was degraded from the dignity of a senator, B. C. 50. His amour with Fausta, the daughter of Sylla, was a strong proof of his debauchery; and Milo, the husband, who discovered the adulterer in his house, revenged the violence offered to his bed, by beating him with stripes, and selling him his liberty at a high price. [This circumstance is related by Aulus Gellius, (Noct. Att. 17, c. 18,) on the authority of Varro. It seems, however, rather extraordinary that the intrigue of a senator with a female of so abandoned a character, could appear deserving of so severe a punishment at a period of such general corruption. It is far more probable that Sallust was sacrificed to party motives. Sallust being tribune of the commons the year that Milo was tried, and also a partizan of Cæsar's, found means to frustrate the schemes of Cicero and the republican party, by effecting Milo's condemnation. The censor Appius Claudius Pulcher, desirous of gaining the friendship of Cicero, which he deemed of importance to his interests, seems to have degraded Sallust from his senatorian rank from no other than party considerations. Sallust, no doubt, was infected with the vices of the age, but he certainly does not seem to have been that monster of depravity which his enemies represented him to be. Would an abandoned profligate write as he has done in praise of virtue and good order? Such effrontery would be almost incredible. Sallust, after his disgrace, retired into Gaul to Cæsar, and the latter, becoming shortly after master of the republic, restored Sallust to his senatorian rank, and had him appointed in succession quæstor and prætor. He accompanied his patron into Africa, and was left there by Cæsar as governor of Numidia. Sallust has been accused of rapacity and extortion while holding this province. This charge is founded upon a passage of Dio Cassius, who says that he was rather the spoiler than the governor of Numidia; but it is difficult to reconcile this statement with the principles openly professed by Sallust in his writings, and to conceive how a man stained with crime could have openly affected such rigour of principles, without disgusting, and exciting the marked animadversion of his contemporaries. It is more than probable that Dio Cassius details merely one of the numerous slanders put in circulation by the enemies of Sallust. A recent editor has even gone so far as to advance the hypothesis that Dio only followed a popular tradition, which confounded Catiline with Sallust. The historian was, however, certainly accused by the Numidians, but acquitted by Cæsar. At his return to Rome he built himself a magnificent house, and bought gardens. These afterwards became the property of his grand-nephew, and subsequently of the emperors. They were on the Quirinal hill, and the spot still retains the name of the gardens of Sallust.] He married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero, and from this circumstance, according to some, arose an immortal hatred between the historian and the orator. Sallust died in the 51st year of his age, 35 years before the Christian era. As a writer he is peculiarly distinguished. He had composed a history of Rome, but nothing remains of it except a few fragments. [His Roman history was divided into six books. It commenced with the death of Sylla, and ended at the conspiracy of Catiline. It was preceded by two discourses, one of which gave an account of the government and manners of Rome from its origin to the period of the civil wars, the other contained a brief recital of the troubles between Marius and Sylla.] His only compositions extant are his history of Catiline's conspiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha king of Numidia. In these celebrated works the author is greatly commended for his elegance, and the vigour and animation of his sentences; he every where displays a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and paints with a masterly hand the causes that gave rise to the great events which he relates. No one was better acquainted with the vices that prevailed in the capital of Italy, and no one seems to have been more severe against the follies of the age, and the failings of which he himself was guilty in the eyes of the world. His descriptions are elegantly correct, and his harangues are nervous and animated, and well suiting the character and the different pursuits of the great men in whose mouth they are placed. The historian, however, is blamed for tedious and insipid exordiums, which often disgust the reader without improving him; his affectation of old and obsolete words and phrases is also censured, and particularly his unwarrantable partiality in some of his narrations. Though faithful in every other respect, he has not painted the character of Cicero with all the fidelity and accuracy which the reader claims from the historian; and in passing in silence over many actions which reflect the greatest honour on the first husband of Terentia, the rival of Cicero has disgraced himself, and rendered his compositions less authentic. There are two orations, or epistles to Cæsar, concerning the regulation of the state, attributed to him, as also an oration against Cicero, whose authenticity some of the moderns have disputed. [It appears, from a passage of Avienus, that he wrote also a geographical work "on the Euxine Sea," now lost.] The best edition of Sallust [is that of Cortius, Lips. 1724, 4to.] Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Suet. de Gram. in

He was very effeminate and luxurious. Horace dedicated 2, od. 2, to him. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Plin. 34.—Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul very intimate with the emperor Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity, and the soundness of his counsels. Julian made him prefect of Gaul.—There is also another Sallust, called Secundus, whom some have improperly confounded with Promotus. Secundus was also one of Julian's favourites, and was made by him prefect of the east. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, his fondness for discipline, and his religious principles. After the death of the emperor Jovian, he was universally named by the officers of the Roman empire to succeed on the imperial throne; but he refused this great though dangerous honour, and pleaded infirmities of body and old age. The Romans wished upon this to invest his son with the imperial purple, but Secundus opposed it, and observed that he was too young to support the dignity.

SALMÆCIS, a fountain of Caria, near Halicarnassus, which rendered effeminate all those who drank of its waters. It was there that Hermaphroditus changed his sex, though he still retained the characteristics of his own. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 285, l. 15, v. 319.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Festus. de V. fig.

SALMANTICA, a town of Spain, now Salamanca.

SALMONE, a town of Elis in Pelopodnesus, with a fountain from which the Enipeus takes its source, and falls into the Alpheus about 40 stadia from Olympia, which, on account of that, is called Salmonis. Ovid. 3. Amor. el. 6, v. 43.—A promontory at the east of Crete. Dionys. 5.

SALMONEUS, a king of Elis, son of Æolus and Enarette, who married Alcidence, by whom he had Tyro. He wished to be called a god, and to receive divine honours from his subjects; therefore, to imitate the thunder, he used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every side, as if to imitate the lightning. This impiety provoked Jupiter. Salmonius was struck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Sisyphus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 235.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 60.—Diod. 4.—*Virg. SALMYDESSUS. [vid. Halmydessus.]

SALO, now Xalon, a river in Spain, falling into the Iberus. Mart. 10, ep. 20.

SALODURUM, now Soleure, a town of the Helvetii—

SALŌME, a queen of Judæa. This name was common to some of the princesses in the family of Herod, &c.

SALŌNA, or SALŌNÆ, a town of Dalmatia, about 10 miles distant from the coast of the Adriatic, taken and destroyed by Pollio, who, on that account, called his son Saloninus, in honour of the victory. [It was rebuilt by Tiberius, who sent hither a Roman colony, and made it the capital of Illyricum.] It was the native place of the emperor Dioclesian, and he retired there to enjoy peace and tranquillity, after he had abdicated the imperial purple, and built a stately palace [about six or seven miles from the city,] the ruins of which were still seen in the 16th century. [Out of the ruins of this magnificent structure, which with its grounds covered an extent of between nine and ten English acres, arose the village of Aspalathus, and long afterwards the provincial town of Spalatro.] Lucan. 4, v. 404.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.

SALONINA, a celebrated matron who married the emperor Gallienus, and distinguished herself by her private as well as public virtues. She was a patroness of all the fine arts, and to her clemency, mildness, and benevolence, Rome was indebted some time for its peace and prosperity. She accompanied her husband in some of his expeditions, and often called him away from the pursuits of pleasure to make war against the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conspirators, who also assassinated her husband and family, about the year 268 of the Christian era.

SALONINUS, a son of Asinius Pollio. He received his name from the conquest of Salone by his father. Some suppose that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which the return of the golden age is so warmly and beautifully anticipated.—P. Licinius Cornelius, a son of Gallienus, by Salonina, sent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there some time, till the usurper Posthumius arose, and proclaimed himself emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy, and put to death in the 10th year of his age.

SALVIAN, one of the fathers of the 5th century, of whose works the best edition is the 12mo. Paris, 1684.

SALVIUS, a flute-player, saluted king by the rebellious slaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for some time war against the Romans.

SALUS, the goddess of health at Rome, worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Hygieia. Liv. 9 and 10.

SALYÆ, a people of Gaul, [extending from the Rhone, along the southern bank of the Druentia or Durance, almost to the Alps. They were powerful opponents to the Greeks of Massilia. Liv. 5, c. 34 and 35, l. 21, c. 26.]

SAMARA, a river of Gaul, now called the Somme, which falls into the British channel near Abbeville.

SAMARIA, [a city and country of Palestine, famous in sacred history. The district of Samaria lay to the north of Judæa. The origin of the Samaritan nation was as follows: In the reign of Rehoboam a division was made of the people of Israel into two distinct kingdoms. One of these kingdoms, called Judah, consisted of such as adhered to Rehoboam and the house of David, comprising the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin; the other ten tribes retained the ancient name of Israelites under Jeroboam. The capital of the state of these latter was Samaria, which was also the name of their country. The Samaritans and the people of Judæa were lasting and bitter enemies. The former deviated in several respects from the strictness of the Mosaic law; though afterwards the religion of the two nations became more closely assimilated; and, in the time of Alexander, the Samaritans obtained leave of that conqueror to build a temple on Mount Gerizim, near the city of Samaria, in imitation of the temple at Jerusalem, where they practised the same forms of worship. Among the people of Judæa, the name of Samaritan was a term of bitter reproach, and disgraceful in a high degree. The city of Samaria was situate on Mount Sameron, and was the residence of the kings of Israel, from Omri its founder to the overthrow of the kingdom. It was razed to the ground by Hyrcanus, but rebuilt by Herod, who completed the work begun by Gabinius, pro-consul of Syria. Herod called it Sebaste in honour of Augustus.]

SAMĀROBRIVA, a town of Gaul, now Amiens, in Picardy. [Its name indicates that it was a place of passage over the river Samara, the word briva signifying in Celtic, "a bridge."]

SAME, [a place on the eastern shore of Cephallenia, which appears to have given an ancient name of Samos to the whole island.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.

SAMNITES, a people of Italy, who inhabited the country [between Apulia on the east, and Latium and Campania on the west, while on the north they reached to the confines of the Marsi, and to the south those of Lucania.] They distinguished themselves by their implacable hatred against the Romans in the first ages of that empire, till they were at last totally extirpated. B. C. 272, after a war of 71 years. Liv. 7, &c. Flor. 1, c. 16, &c. 1. 3, c. 18.—Strab. 5.—Lucan. 2.—Eutrop. 2.

SAMONIUM, [a promontory of Crete, at its eastern extremity, now Salmone.]

SAMOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, on the coast of Asia Minor, from which it is divided by a narrow strait, with a capital of the same name, built B. C. 986. It is about 87 miles in circumference, and is famous for the birth of Pythagoras. It has been anciently called Parthenia, Anthemusa, Stephane, Melampyryllus, Anthemus, Cyparissia, and Dryusa,

The fertility of Samos was anciently proverbial, and the possession of it was much sought after. It was famed also for a salubrious climate, a pure air, and abundance of water. Athenæus states that the fig-trees, apple-trees, and vines, bore fruit twice a year; Pliny takes notice of its pomegranates. This island also abounded with a great variety of game, as it still does at the present day; it contains some iron mines, emery-stone, and plenty of ochre.] It was first in the possession of the Leleges, and afterwards of the Ionians. The people of Samos were at first governed by kings, and afterwards the form of their government became democratical and oligarchical. Samos was in its most flourishing situation under Polycrates, who had made himself absolute there. The Samians assisted the Greeks against the Persians when Xerxes invaded Europe, and were reduced under the power of Athens, after a revolt by Pericles, B. C. 441. They were afterwards subdued by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and were restored to their ancient liberty by Augustus. Under Vespasian, Samos became a Roman province. Juno was held in the greatest veneration there, her temple was uncommonly magnificent, and it was even said that the goddess had been born there under a willow-tree on the banks of the Imbrusus. [The magnificent temple erected here in honour of the goddess is now totally annihilated, and the greatest part of the ancient splendour of the island is lost.] Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 2 and 4.—Plut. in Per.—Plin. 5, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 20.—Thucyd.—The islands of Samothrace and Cephallenia were also known by the name of Samos. [Cephallenia was called the steep Samos.]

SAMOSĀTA, a town of Syria, [and capital of Commagene, on the right bank of the Euphrates. It was the residence of Antiochus when Pompey granted to him this province, and which his successors enjoyed until the reign of Tiberius, when it became a Roman province. Lucian was born at Samosata.]

SAMOTHRĀCE, or SAMOTHRĀCIA, [now Samanaraki or Mandraki,] an island in the Ægean Sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus, on the coast of Thrace, from which it is distant about 32 miles. It was known by the ancient names of Leucosia, Melitis, Electria, Leucania, and Dardana, [because, according to Pliny, Dardanus retired to it.] It was afterwards called Samos, and distinguished from the Samos which lies on the coast of Ionia, by the epithet of Thracian, or by the name of Samothrace. It is about 38 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or only 20 according to modern travellers. The origin of the first inhabitants of Samothrace is unknown. Some, however, suppose that they were Thracians, and that the place was afterwards peopled by the colonies of the Pelasgians, Samians, and Phœnicians: Samothrace is famous for a deluge which inundated the country, and reached the very top of the highest mountains. This inundation, which happened before the age of the Argonauts, was owing to the sudden overflow of the waters of the Euxine, which the ancients considered merely as a lake. The Samothracians were very religious, [but celebrated particularly for the worship of the Cabiri;] and as all mysteries were supposed to have taken their origin there, the island received the surname of sacred, and was a safe and inviolable asylum to all fugitives and criminals. The island was originally governed by kings, but afterwards the government became democratical. It enjoyed all the rights and immunities under the Romans till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced it, with the rest of the islands in the Ægean, into the form of a province. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.—Herod. 7, c. 108, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 208.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 12.

SANA, a town of Mount Athos, near which Xerxes began to make a channel to convey the sea. [It lay opposite to Acanthus. vid. Acanthus and Athos.]

SANCHONIATHON, a Phœnician historian born at Berytus, or, according to others, at Tyre. He flourished a few years before the Trojan war, and wrote, in the language of his country, an history in nine books, in which he amply treated of the theology and antiquities of Phœnicia and the neighbouring places. It was compiled from the various records found in cities, and the annals which were usually kept in the temples of the gods among the ancients. This history was translated into Greek by Philo, a native of Byblus, who lived in the reign of the emperor Adrian. [Some few fragments of this Greek translation are extant in Porphyry "de Abſtinentia." Dodwell, in an express treatise, has laboured to show that Sanchoniathon never existed, and Dupin has attempted to destroy entirely the credit of the supposed fragments; but other learned men consider them as authentic. According to Suidas, Sanchoniathon wrote a treatise on the religious institutions of the Phœnicians, another on the physiology of Hermes, and a third on the Egyptian theology.]

SANCUS, SANGUS, or SANCTUS, a deity of the Sabines introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dius Fidius. [The same as Hercules.] According to some, Sancus was father to Sabus or Sabinus, the first king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, v. 421.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

SANDALIOTIS, a name given to Sardinia from its resemblance to a sandal. Plin. 3, c. 7.

SANDROCOTTUS, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatness; the conqueror ordered him to be seized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at last dropped down overwhelmed with fatigue. As he slept on the ground a lion came to him and gently licked the sweat from his face. This uncommon tameness of the animal appeared supernatural to Sandrocottus, and raised his ambition. He aspired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander he made himself master of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Justin. 15, c. 4.

SANGARIUS, or SANGARIS, [a river of Asia Minor, rising in Galatia, on the confines of Phrygia, and after a considerable course falling into the Euxine. It is now the Sakuria.] The daughter of the Sangarius became pregnant of Altes only from gathering the boughs of an almond-tree on the banks of the river. Hecuba, according to some, was daughter of this river. Some of the poets call it Sagaris. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10.—Claudian. in Eutrop. 2.—Paus. 7, c. 17.

SANNYRION, a tragic poet of Athens. He composed many dramatic pieces, one of which was called Io, and another Danae. Athen. 9.

SANTONES, and SANTONÆ, now Saintonge, a people with a town of the same name in Gaul. Lucan. 1, v. 422.—Martial. 3, ep. 96.

SAPIS, now Savio, a river of Gallia Cispadana, falling into the Adriatic. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

SAPOR, a king of Persia, who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the Christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious, Sapor wished to increase his paternal dominions by conquest; and as the indulgence of the emperors of Rome seemed favourable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak, and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces, the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A. D. 293, after a reign of 32 years. He was succeeded by his son called Hormisdas. Marcellin. &c.—The 2d of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas the 2d on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the monarch, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia, and defeated the emperor Valens. Sapor died A. D. 380, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor the third, a prince who died after a reign of five years, A. D. 389, in the age of Theodosius the Great. Marcellin, &c.

SAPPHO, a female celebrated for her beauty, her poetical talents, and her amorous disposition, was born in the island of Lesbos about 600 years before Christ. Her father's name, according to Herodotus, was Scamandronymus, or, according to others, Symon, or Semus, or Etarchus, and her mother's name was Cleis. [This is incorrect: she was married to Percolas, and the offspring of that union was a daughter named Cleis.] Her tender passions were so violent, that some have represented her attachments with three of her female companions, Plesiphe, Atthis, and Megara, as criminal. [This is equally incorrect: Sappho had united around her a number of young females, whom she instructed in music and poetry; and they in turn revered her as their benefactress. This institution, however, was made a pretext for the gross calumnies which have tarnished her reputation.] She conceived such a passion for Phaon, a youth of Mitylene, that upon his refusal to gratify her desires, she threw herself into the sea from Mount Leucas. [She is represented by Ovid as very far from handsome, and as she was probably no longer young when she became enamoured of Phaon, his neglect of her is not at all to be wondered at.] She had composed nine books in lyric verses, besides epigrams, elegies, &c. Of all these compositions nothing now remains but two pieces, whose uncommon sweetness and elegance show how meritoriously the praises of the ancients have been bestowed upon a poetess who for the sublimity of her genius was called the tenth Muse. [Besides these two pieces, there remain some fragments quoted by the scholiast and others. What remains of the poetry of Sappho is generally published with the odes of Anacreon. Plutarch compares the inspiration of her verses to that of the Pythoness. The fragments that remain of the compositions of Sappho confirm this decision, and completely justify the admiration of antiquity. Dionysius of Halicarnassus has preserved her beautiful "Ode to Venus;" a second ode, still more beautiful, is quoted by Longinus. Independent of these there only remain some epigrams and detached verses. The most critical edition is that of Bloomfield, in the Museum Criticum, Vol. 1.] Her compositions were all extant in the age of Horace. The Lesbians were so sensible of the merit of Sappho, that after her death they paid her divine honours, and raised her temples and altars, and stamped their money with her image. The Sapphic verse was invented by her. Ovid. Heroid. 15. Trist. 2. v. 365.—Horat. 2, Od. 13.—Herodot. 2, c. 135.—Stat. 5. Sylv. 3, v. 155.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 18 and 29.—Plin. 22, c. 8.

SARACENI, [or Saracens, a general appellation by which the tribes from Mecca to the Euphrates were confounded by the Greeks and Latins. Concerning the etymology of the name various opinions have been advanced. Many derive it from an Arabic term Sherkin, which signifies an oriental situation.]

SARÁVUS, now the Soar, a river of Belgium falling into the Moselle.

SARDANAPÁLUS, the 40th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. The greatest part of his time was spent in the company of his eunuchs, and the monarch generally appeared in the midst of his concubines disguised in the habit of a female, and spinning wool for his amusement. This effeminacy irritated his officers; Sabelis and Arsaces conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus quitted his voluptuousness for a while, and appeared at the head of his armies. The rebels were defeated in three successive battles, but at last Sardanapalus was beaten and besieged in the city of Ninus, for two years. When he despaired of success, he burned himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. This famous event happened B. C. 820, according to Eusebius; though Justin and others, with less probability, place it 80 years earlier. [vid. Anchiale.] Herodot. 2, c. 150.—Diod. 2.—Strab. 14.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 35.

SARDINIA, the greatest island in the Mediterranean after Sicily, at the south of Corsica. [It is about 140 miles in length from N. to S. and 60 in its medial breadth from E. to W.] It was originally called Sandahotis or Ichouasa, from its resembling the human foot, (ⓧⓧⓧ) and it received the name of Sardinia from Sardinus, a son of Hercules, who settled there with a colony which he had brought with him from Libya. [Others make even the name Sardinia refer to its peculiar shape, and derive it from the Oriental term Saad or Sarad, denoting the traces of a foot. [Other colonies, under Aristæus, Norax, and Iolas, also settled there. [Some make colonies of Trojans to have settled in it after the ruin of their country; and to have been afterwards driven to the mountains by the Greeks who came hither.] It was first held by the Phœniciaus. After them the Carthaginians were long masters of it, and were dispossessed by the Romans in the first Punic war, A. U. C. 521. [Corsica was also subdued in the following year, and both islands became subject to the same prætor.] Some call it with Sicily, one of the granaries of Rome. The air was very unwholesome, though the soil was fertile in corn, in wine, and oil. [The air is still unwholesome on account of the morasses and the high mountains on the north side, which obstruct the course of the wind.] Neither wolves nor serpents are found in Sardinia, nor any poisonous herb, except one, [a species of ranunculus,] which, when eaten, contracts the nerves, and is attended with a paroxysm of laughter, the forerunner of death; hence risus Sardonicus, or Sardous. [Sardinia at the present day is rich in minerals. Several silver mines are worked; the lead mines, however, are the most productive; those of Iglesias yielding from 50 to 80 pounds in the hundred-weight.] *Cic. SARDICA, [the metropolis of Dacia Mediterranea. It was situate a considerable distance to the north-west of Philippopolis, on the confines of Pæonia. The Bulgarians changed the name to Triaditza. The vestiges of it are contiguous to Sophia.]

SARDIS, or SARDES, now Sart, a town of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, situate at the foot of Mount Tmolus, on the banks of the Pactolus. [The citadel was placed on a craggy mountain south-east of the town, and on account of its situation was deemed impregnable. Sardis was an ancient city, posterior, however, to the siege of Troy. According to Herodotus it was seized by the Cimmerians who were driven from their country by the Scythian Nomades, in the reign of Ardyus, who ascended the throne 630 B. C. It was wrested from them by Alyattes 2d, who began to reign 619 years B. C. It became subject to Cyrus 584 B. C. who gained a victory over Cræsus in the plain before the city. In the year 214 B. C. Antiochus the Great made himself master of Sardis, and held it for 25 years. It was the place of his retreat after the battle of Magnesia. After his departure from the city to join Seleucus his son, it surrendered to the Romans.] It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who ordered it to be rebuilt. It was burnt by the Athenians B. C. 504, which became the cause of the invasion of Attica by Darius. Plut. in Alex.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 137, 152, &c.—Strab. 13.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.

SARDONES, the people of Roussilon in France, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Plin. 2, c. 4.

SARDUS, a son of Hercules, who led a colony to Sardinia, and gave it his name.

SAREPHTA, a town of Phœnicia between Tyre and Sidon, now Sarfand.

SARMÆTE, or SAUROMÆTE, the inhabitants of Sarmatia. vid. Sarmatia.

SARMÆTIA, an extensive country at the north of Europe and Asia, divided into European and Asiatic. The European was bounded by the ocean on the north, Germany and the Vistula on the west, [and extended to the Euxine on the east, being parted from Asia and Asiatic Sarmatia by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, Palus Mæotis, and Tanais. Asiatic Sarmatia had towards the north unknown boundaries, towards the west European Sarmatia, towards the east Scythia, and towards the south and south-east, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, and the Caspian Sea.] The former contained the modern kingdoms of Russia, Poland, Lithuania, and Little Tartary; and the latter, Great Tartary, Circassia, and the neighbouring country. The Sarmatians were a savage uncivilized nation, often confounded with the Scythians, naturally warlike, and famous for painting their bodies to appear more terrible in the field of battle. They were well known for their lewdness, and they passed among the Greeks and Latins by the name of Barbarians. In the time of the emperors they became very powerful, they disturbed the peace of Rome by their frequent incursions; till, at last, increased by the savage hordes of Scythia, under the barbarous names of Huns, Vandals, Goths, Alans, &c. they successfully invaded and ruined the empire in the 3d and 4th centuries of the Christian era. They generally lived on the mountains, without any habitation except their chariots, whence they have been called Hamacobii; they lived upon plunder, and fed upon milk mixed with the blood of horses. Strab. 7, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Diod. 2.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Juv. 2.—*Ovid. SARMATICUM MARE, a name given to the Euxine Sea because on the coast of Sarmatia. Ovid. 4, ex. Pont. ep. 10, v. 38.

SARNUS, a river of Picenum, dividing it from Campania, and falling into the Tuscan Sea. Stat. 1, Sylt. 2, v. 265.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.—Strab. 5.

SARON, a king of Troæzene, unusually fond of hunting. He was drowned in the sea, where he had swam for some miles in pursuit of a stag. He was made a sea-god by Neptune, and divine honours were paid to him by the Troæzians. It was customary for sailors to offer him sacrifices before they embarked. That part of the sea where he was drowned was called Saronicus Sinus, on the coast of Achaia, near the isthmus of Corinth. Saron built a temple to Diana at Troæzene, and instituted festivals to her honour, called from himself Saronia. Paus. 2, c. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.

SARONICUS SINUS, now the Gulf of Euxina, a bay of the Ægean Sea, lying at the [south-west of Attica, and north-east of Argolis, and commencing between the promontories of Sunium and Scylleum.] Some suppose that this part of the sea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there, or from a small river which discharged itself on the coast, or from a small harbour of the same name. This bay is about 62 miles in circumference, 23 miles in its broadest, and 25 in its longest part, according to modern calculation.

SARPEDON, a son of Jupiter by Europa, the daughter of Agenor. He banished himself from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himself king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to assist Priam against the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at last killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy, and his body by order of Jupiter, was conveyed to Lycia by Apollo, where his friends and relations paid him funeral honours, and raised a monument to perpetuate his valour. According to some mythologists, the brother of king Minos, and the prince who assisted Priam, were two different persons. This last was king of Lycia, and son of Jupiter, by Laodamia, the daughter of Bellerophon, and lived about a hundred years after the age of the son of Europa. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 12.—Homer. Il. 16.—A son of Neptune, killed by Hercules for his barbarous treatment of strangers.—A town of Cilicia, famous for a temple sacred to Apollo and Diana.—Also a promontory of the same name in Cilicia, beyond which Antiochus was not permitted to sail by a treaty of peace which he had made with the Romans. Liv. 38, c. 38.—Mela, 1, c. 13.

SARRA, a town of Phœnicia, the same as Tyre. It receives this name from a small shell-fish of the same name, which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whose blood garments were dyed. Hence came the epithet of sarranus, so often applied to Tyrian colours, as well as to the inhabitants of the colonies of the Tyrians, particularly Carthage. [The names Sar, Sur, Tyr, would seem rather to have some analogy with one of the Oriental names of the Sun.] Sil. 6, v. 662, l. 45, v. 205.—Virg. G. 2, v. 506.—Festus. de V. sig.

SARRASTES, a people of Campania on the Sarnus, who assisted Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.

SARSINA, an ancient town of Umbria, where the poet Plautus was born. The inhabitants are called Sarsinates. Martial. 9, ep. 59.—Plin. 3, c. 14.—Ital. 8, v. 462.

SASON, an island at the entrance of the Adriatic Sea, lying between Brundisium and Aulon on the coast of Greece. It was barren and inhospitable. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 2, v. 627, and 5, v. 650.—Sil. It. 7, v. 480.

SATICŪLA, and SATICULUS, a town near Capua. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 729.—Liv. 9, c. 21. l. 23, c. 39.

SATŪRA, a lake of Latium, forming part of the Pontine lakes. Sil. 8, v. 382.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 801.

SATUREIUM, or SATUREUM, a town of Calabria, near Tarentum, with famous pastures, and horses, whence the epithet of satureianus in Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

SATURNĀLIA, festivals in honour of Saturn celebrated the 17th of December. They were instituted long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. Some however suppose, that the Saturnalia were first observed at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines; while others support, that Janus first instituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learnt agriculture. Others suppose, that they were first celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator Posthumius. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the solemnity continued for 3, [and afterwards, by order of Caligula, for 5 days.] The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevailed. The slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and to speak with freedom upon every subject. It was usual for friends to make presents one to another, all animosity ceased, no criminals were executed, schools were shut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot, and debauchery. In the sacrifices the priests made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a custom which was never observed at any other festivals. Senec. ep. 18.—Cato. de R. R. 57.—Sueton. in Vesp. 19.—Cic. ad Attic. 5, ep. 20.

SATURNIA, a name given to Italy, because Saturn had reigned there during the golden age. Virg. G. 2, v. 173.—A name given to Juno, as being the daughter of Saturn. Virg. G. 2, v. 173, Æn. 3, v. 380.—An ancient town of Italy, supposed to be built by Saturn on the Tarpeian rock. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 358.

SATURNINUS, P. Sempronius, a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops after he had rendered himself celebrated by his victories over the Barbarians. His integrity, his complaisance, and affability, had gained him the affection of the people, but his fondness of ancient discipline provoked his soldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 262.—Sextus Junius, a Gaul, intimate with Aurelian. The emperor esteemed him greatly, not only for his private virtues, but for his abilities as a general, and for the victories which he had obtained in different parts of the empire. He was saluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple, which he rejected with disdain and horror. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces against him, and besieged him in Apamea, where he destroyed himself when unable to make head against his powerful adversary.—Appuleius, a tribune of the people, who raised a sedition at Rome, intimidated the senate, and tyrannized for three years. Meeting at last with opposition, he seized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to trust himself amidst the people, he was suddenly torn to pieces. His sedition has received the name of Apuleiana in the Roman annals. Flor.—Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly esteemed by Pliny, who speaks of him with great warmth and approbation, as an historian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always consulted the opinion of Saturninus before he published his compositions.

SATURNIUS, a name given to Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, as being the sons of Saturn.

SATURNUS, a son of Cœlus, or Uranus, by Terra, called also Titea, Thea, or Titheia. [vid. the end of this article.] He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, he revenged himself on his father, whose cruelty to his children, had provoked the anger of Thea. The mother armed her son with a scythe, which was fabricated with the metals drawn from her bowels, and as Cœlus was going to unite himself to Thea, Saturn mutilated him, and for ever prevented him from increasing the number of his children, whom he treated with unkindness and confined in the infernal regions. After this the sons of Cœlus were restored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the consent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Pursuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his sons as soon as born, because, as some observe, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindness to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to see her children perish, concealed from her husband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and instead of the children, she gave him large stones, which he immediately swallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titan was some time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war against him, dethroned and imprisoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was secretly educated in Crete, was no sooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on his throne. Saturn, unmindful of his son's kindness, conspired against him, when he heard that he raised cabals against him, but Jupiter banished him from his throne, and the father fled for safety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latium, as being the place of his concealment (lateo.) Janus, who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention, he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himself in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the useful and liberal arts. His reign there was so mild and popular, so beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happiness and tranquillity which the earth then enjoyed. Saturn was father of Chiron the centaur by Philyra, whom he had changed into a mare, to avoid the importunities of Rhea. The worship of Saturn was not so solemn or so universal as that of Jupiter. It was usual to offer human victims on his altars, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Hercules, who substituted small images of clay. In the sacrifices of Saturn, the priest always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unusual at other solemnities. The god is generally represented as an old man, bent through age and infirmity. He holds a scythe in his right hand, with a serpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child, which he raises up as if instantly to devour it. Tatus, king of the Sabines, first built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a second was afterwards added by Tullus Hostilius, and a third by the first consuls. On his statues were generally hung fetters, in commemoration of the chains he had worn when imprisoned by Jupiter. From this circumstance all slaves that obtained their liberty generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the statues to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treasury, and it was there also that the names of foreign ambassadors were enrolled. [Bochart considers Saturn to have been the same with Noah. According to others, Saturn was the same with Time, the Greek words which stand for Saturn and Time, differing only in one letter, (χρονος. Saturnus, χρονος, tempus;) and on this account Saturn is represented as devouring his children and casting them up again, as time devours and consumes all things which it has produced, which at length revive again and are as it were renewed: or else, days, months, and years, are the children of time which he constantly devours and produces anew. So some derive the Latin name from saturare, because, as Cicero says, saturatur an'is quos ipse devorat, he is satisfied with the years which he devours. vid. Remarks under the article Jupiter.] *Hesiod. SATYRI, demi gods of the country whose origin is unknown. [vid. the end of this article.] They are represented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, short horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themselves known in his orgies by their riot and lasciviousness. The first fruits of every thing were generally offered to them. The Romans promiscuously called them Fauni, Panrs, and Sylvari. It is said that a Satyr was brought to Sylla, as that general returned from Thesaly. The monster had been surprised asleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the presence of the Roman general, and Sylla was so disgusted with it, that he ordered it to be instantly removed. The monster answered in every degree the description which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. [The name Σατυρος is commonly derived from σαθν, indicative of their lasciviousness. Bochart, however, derives the term Satyr from the Hebrew Sair, which signifies a devil under the shape of a goat. The introduction of Satyrs into the poetical world was probably owing to large monkeys seen in the woods, which nearly resembled men. These had frequently terrified the shepherds and pursued the shepherdesses, and perhaps some of the priests of Bacchus and the shepherds may occasionally have arrayed themselves in goat-skins, and counterfeited the appearance of Satyrs to seduce the innocent shepherdesses.] Paus. 1, c. 23.—Plut. in Syll.—*Virg. SAXONES, a people of Germany, near the Chersonesus Cimbrica. [The first ancient writer who seems to have mentioned the Saxones is Ptolemy, who speaks of them as occupying the neck of the Cimbric Chersonese, or modern Jutland, and three small islands at the mouth of the Elbe. They afterwards became a powerful and extensive nation, and distinguished themselves by their naval force. In the year 449, Hengist and Horsa made a descent on the British coasts, and other chieftains followed successively. SCAMANDER, or SCAMANDROS, a celebrated river of Troas, [rising, according to Strabo, in the highest part of Mount Ida, in the same hill with the Granicus and Esepus, and falling into the sea at Sigæum. Every thing tends to show that it is the same with the modern Mendere, as Wood, Rennel, and others maintain. The Mendere is 40 miles long, 300 feet broad, deep in the time of flood, but nearly dry in the time of summer. Dr. Clarke successfully combats the opinion of those who make the Scamander to have arisen from the springs of Bounabarshy, and traces the source of the river to the highest mountain in the chain of Ida, now called Kasdaghy.] It receives the Simois in its course, and towards its mouth it is very muddy, and flows through marshes. [Between the Scamander and Simois, Homer's Troy is supposed to have stood.] This river, according to Homer, was called Xanthus by the gods, and Scamander by men. The waters of the Scamander had the singular property of giving a beautiful colour to the hair or the wool of such animals as bathed in them; and from this circumstance the three goddesses, Minerva, Juno, and Venus, bathed there before they appeared before Paris to obtain the golden apple. [The name Xanthus, yellow, was given to the Scamander from the peculiar colour of its waters, a name which is still very applicable to the Mendere, the yellow colour of whose waters has repeatedly attracted the attention of modern travellers.] It was usual among all the virgins of Troas to bathe in the Scamander when they were arrived to nubile years, and to offer to the god their virginity in these words, λαβε μου, Σκαμανδρε, την παρθενειαν. [This custom was discontinued on account of an Athenian, named Cimon, having assumed the disguise of a river-god, and violated a noble virgin, at that time betrothed.] The god of the Scamander had a regular priest, and sacrifices offered to him. Some suppose that the river received its name from Scamander, the son of Corybas. Ælian. Anim. 8, c. 21.—Strab. 1 and 13.—Plin. 5, c. 30.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—*Homer. SCANTINIA LEX de pudicitia, by C. Scatinus Aricinus, the tribune, was enacted against those who kept catamites, and such as prostituted themselves to any vile or unnatural service. The penalty was originally a fine, but it was afterwards made a capital crime under Augustus. [It is sometimes called Scatinia Lex; not, however, from one Scatinus, who, according to Valerius Maximus, was the first person condemned under it, but probably from the name of the individual who proposed the law, Scatinus, and not Scatinus.]

SCAURUS, (M. Æmilius,) a Roman consul who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the bar, and by his successes in Spain, in the capacity of commander. He was sent against Jugurtha, and some time after accused of suffering himself to be bribed by the Numidian prince. [According to Sallust, this nobleman tarnished the lustre of his splendid talents by avarice and other degrading passions; while Cicero, on the contrary, speaks of him in the highest terms in various parts of his writings. Sallust's known dislike to the nobility may account in some degree for this discrepancy. Scaurus wrote a work in three books, recording the principal occurrences and transactions of his own life, which Cicero commends, and considers equal to Xenophon's Life of Cyrus.] Scaurus conquered the Ligurians, and in his censorship he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmylian. He was originally very poor. His son, of the same name, made himself known by the large theatre he built during his edileship. This theatre, which could contain 30,000 spectators, was supported by 360 columns of marble, 38 feet in height, and adorned with 3000 brazen statues. This celebrated edifice, according to Pliny, proved more fatal to the manners and the simplicity of the Romans than the proscriptions and wars of Sylla had done to the inhabitants of the city. Scaurus married Murcia. Cic. in Brut.—*Val. The severity of this command rendered young Scaurus melancholy, and he plunged a sword into his own heart to free himself from farther ignominy.—Aurelius, a Roman consul taken prisoner by the Gauls. He was put to a cruel death because he told the king of the enemy not to cross the Alps to invade Italy, which was universally deemed unconquerable.—M. Æmilius, a man in the reign of Tiberius, accused of adultery with Livia, and put to death. He was an eloquent orator, but very lascivious and debauched in his morals.—Terentius, a Latin grammarian. SCIPIADÆ, a name applied to the two Sci-pious, who obtained the surname of Africanus from the conquest of Carthage. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 843.

SCIPIO, a celebrated family at Rome, who obtained the greatest honours in the republic. The name seems to be derived from Scipio, which signifies a stick, because one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a stick. The Scipios were a branch of the Cornelian family. The most illustrious were P. Corn. a man made master of horse by Camillus, &c.—A Roman dictator.—L. Cornel. a consul, A. U. C. 454, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterræ.—Another consul A. U. C. 493.—Cn. surnamed Asina, was consul A. U. C. 492 and 493. He was conquered in his first consulship in a naval battle, and lost 17 ships. The following year he took Aleria in Corsica, and defeated Hanno, the Carthaginian general, in Sardinia. He also took 200 of the enemy's ships, and the city of Panormus in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneius Scipio. Publius, in the beginning of the second Punic war, was sent with an army to Spain to oppose Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had passed over into Italy, he attempted by quick marches and secret evolutions to stop his progress. He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where he nearly lost his life, had not his son, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus, courageously defended him. He again passed into Spain, where he obtained some memorable victories over the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneius shared the supreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin. They separated their armies, and soon after Publius was furiously attacked by the two Asdrubals and Mago who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to resist with success the three Carthaginian generals. The Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No sooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneius Scipio, whom the revolt of 30,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprized of his brother's death, secured an eminence, where he was soon surrounded on all sides. After desperate acts of valour he was left among the slain, or, according to some, he fled into a tower where he was burnt with some of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Polyb. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6, &c.—Eutrop. 3, c. 8, &c.—Publius Cornelius, surnamed Africanus, was son of Publius Scipio who was killed in Spain. He first distinguished himself at the battle of Ticinus, where he saved his father's life by deeds of unexpected valour and boldness. The battle of Cannæ, which proved so fatal to the Roman arms, instead of disheartening Scipio, raised his expectations, and he no sooner heard that some of his desperate countrymen wished to abandon Italy, and to fly from the insolence of the conqueror, than, with his sword in his hand, and by his firmness and example, he obliged them to swear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the first man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21st year, Scipio was made an edile, an honourable office, which was never given but to such as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneius Scipio, had been slaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father, and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honour of the republic. It was soon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were banished from that part of the continent, the whole province became tributary to Rome; New Carthage submitted in one day, and in a battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After these signal victories, Scipio was recalled to Rome, which still trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at her gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio opposed the measures which his countrymen wished to pursue, and he declared in the senate that if Annibal was to be conquered he must be conquered in Africa. These bold measures were immediately adopted, though opposed by the eloquence, age, and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was empowered to conduct the war on the coasts of Africa. With the dignity of consul he embarked for Carthage. Success attended his arms, his conquests were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Asdrubal was set on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated in a drawn battle. These repeated losses alarmed Carthage; Annibal, who was victorious at the gates of Rome, was instantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greatest generals of the age met each other in the field. Terms of accommodation were proposed; but in the parley which the two commanders had together nothing satisfactory was offered, and while the one enlarged on the vicissitudes of human affairs, the other wished to dictate like a conqueror, and recommend the decision of the controversy to the sword. This celebrated battle was fought near Zama, and both generals displayed their military knowledge in drawing up their armies and in choosing their ground. Their courage and intrepidity were not less conspicuous in charging the enemy; a thousand acts of valour were performed on both sides, and though the Carthaginians fought in their own defence, and the Romans for fame and glory, yet the conqueror of Italy was vanquished. About 20,000 Carthaginians were slain, and the same number made prisoners of war, B. C. 202. Only 2000 of the Romans were killed. This battle was decisive: the Carthaginians sued for peace.

which Scipio at last granted on the most severe and humiliating terms. The conqueror, after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the most unbounded applause, honoured with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. Here he enjoyed for some time the tranquillity and the honours which his exploits merited, but in him also, as in other great men, fortune showed herself inconstant. Scipio defended the populace in wishing to distinguish the senators from the rest of the people at the public exhibitions, and when he canvassed for the consulship for two of his friends, he had the mortification to see his application slighted, and the honours which he claimed bestowed on a man of no character, and recommended by neither abilities nor meritorious actions. He retired from Rome, no longer to be the spectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen, and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother against Antiochus king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with usual success, and the Asiatic monarch submitted to the conditions which the conquerors dictated. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies still unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raised seditions against him, and the Petillii, two tribunes of the people, accused the conqueror of extortion in the provinces of Asia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condescended to answer to the accusation of his calumniators: the first day was spent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the second day of his trial, the accused interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, Tribunes and fellow-citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians: come therefore with me, Romans, let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms. These words had the desired effect, the tribes and all the assembly followed Scipio, the court was deserted, and the tribunes were left alone in the seat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was past and forgotten, Africanus was a third time summoned to appear; but he had fled before the impending storm, and retired to his country-house at Liternum. The accusation was therefore stopped, and the accusers silenced, when one of the tribunes, formerly distinguished for his malevolence against Scipio, rose to defend him, and declared in the assembly, that it reflected the highest disgrace on the Roman people, that the conqueror of Annibal should become the sport of the populace, and be exposed to the malice and envy of disappointed ambition. Some time after Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Christ, in the 48th year of his age; and so great an aversion did he express, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans and the ingratitude of their senators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to

Rome. They were accordingly inhumed at Liternum, where his wife Emilia, the daughter of Paulus Emilius, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, raised a mausoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his statue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his life-time of the honours which belonged to him as a conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following ages as a pattern of virtue, and of innocence, courage, and liberality. As a general, the fame and the greatness of his conquests explain his character, and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himself inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio asked him what rank he would claim if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general answered, If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myself greater than the conqueror of Darius and the ally of the Tarentines. As an instance of Scipio's continence, ancient authors have faithfully recorded that the conqueror of Spain refused to see a beautiful princess that had fallen into his hands after the taking of New Carthage, and that he not only restored her inviolate to her parents, but also added immense presents for the person to whom she was betrothed. It was to the artful complaisance of Africanus that the Romans owed their alliance with Masinissa, king of Numidia, and also that with king Syphax. The friendship of Scipio and Lælius is well known. Polyb. 6.—Plut.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. in Brut. &c.—Eutrop.—Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the consulship A. U. C. 562, for his services to the state, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus king of Syria, who had declared war against the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valour, and the advice of the conqueror of Annibal, he soon routed the enemy, and in a battle near the city of Sardis he killed 50,000 foot and 4000 horse. Peace was soon after settled by the submission of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the surname of Asiaticus. He did not, however, long enjoy his prosperity; Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury against Asiaticus, and the two Petillii, his devoted favourites, presented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an enquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and his allies. The petition was instantly received, and Asiaticus, charged to have suffered himself to be corrupted by Antiochus, was summoned to appear before the tribunal of Terentius Culeo, who was on this occasion created prætor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipios, soon found Asiaticus, with his two lieutenants and his quæstor, guilty of having received, the first 6000 pounds weight of gold, and 480 pounds weight of silver, and the others nearly an equal sum, from the monarch against whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war. Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines: but while the others gave security, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money which he had brought from Asia, and therefore that he was innocent. For this obstinacy Scipio was dragged to prison, but his cousin Nasica pleaded his cause before the people, and the prætor instantly ordered the goods of the prisoner to be seized and confiscated. The sentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were insufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greatest justification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his house had never been in the possession of Antiochus or his subjects. This, however, did not totally liberate him, he was reduced to poverty, and refused to accept the offers of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return the Romans, ashamed of their severity towards him, rewarded his merit with such uncommon liberality, that Asiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honour of his victory over Antiochus, for ten successive days, at his own expense. Liv. 38, c. 55, &c.—Eutrop. 4.—Nasica was son of Cneus Scipio, and cousin to Scipio Africanus. He was refused the consulship, though supported by the interest and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal; but he afterwards obtained it, and in that honourable office conquered the Boii and gained a triumph. He was also successful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the statue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman senate delegated one of their body, who was the most remarkable for the purity of his manners and the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddess in the harbour of Ostia. Nasica was the object of their choice, and as such he was enjoined to bring the statue of the goddess to Rome with the greatest pomp and solemnity. Nasica also distinguished himself by the active part he took in confuting the accusations laid against the two Scipios, Africanus and Asiaticus. There was also another of the same name who distinguished himself by his enmity against the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related. Paterc. 2, c. 1, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 29, c. 14, &c.—Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He received the same surname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus first appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards distinguished himself as a legionary tribune in the Spanish provinces, where he killed a Spaniard of gigantic stature, and obtained a mural crown at the siege of Intercatia. He passed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from king Masinissa, the ally of Rome, and he was the spectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which soon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed consul, though under the age required for that important office. The surname which he had received from his grandfather he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finish the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the senate to choose his colleagues, he took with him his friend Lælius, whose father of the same name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and shared the victories of the first Africanus. The siege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigour. Scipio had no sooner appeared before the walls of the enemy than every communication with the land was cut off, and that they might not have the command of the sea, a stupendous mole was thrown across the harbour with immense labour and expense. This, which might have disheartened the most active enemy, rendered the Carthaginians more eager in the cause of freedom and independence; all the inhabitants, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, employed themselves without cessation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a short time, in spite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were astonished to see another harbour formed, and 50 galleys suddenly issuing under sail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ships, might have gained the victory, but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cause, and the enemy had sufficient time to prepare themselves. Scipio soon got possession of a small eminence in the harbour, and, by the success of his subsequent operations, he broke open one of the gates of the city, and entered the streets, where he made his way by fire and sword. The surrender of above 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total submission of Carthage B. C. 147. The captive city was set on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demolish its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical scene; and, in bewailing the miseries of Carthage, he expressed his fears lest Rome in her turn, in some future age, should exhibit such a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal, and like him he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and received the surname of Africanus. He was not long left in the enjoyment of his glory before he was called to obtain fresh honours. He was chosen consul a second time, and appointed to finish the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without success or vigorous exertions against Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemy had been consumed by famine or by self-destruction, B. C. 133. From his conquests in Spain, Æmilianus was honoured with a second triumph, and with the surname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was short, and, by telling the people that the murder of their favourite, his brother-in-law Gracchus, was lawful, since he was turbulent and inimical to the peace of the republic, Scipio incurred the displeasure of the tribunes, and was received with hisses. His authority for a moment quelled their sedition, when he reproached them for their cowardice, and exclaimed, Factionis wretches, do you think that your clamours can intimidate me; me whom the fury of your enemies never daunted? Is this the gratitude that you owe to my father Paulus, who conquered Macedonia, and to me? Without my family you were slaves. Is this the respect you owe to your deliverers? Is this your affection? This firmness silenced the murmurs of the assembly, and some time after Scipio retired from the clamours of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he passed the rest of his time in innocent pleasures and amusement; in diversions which had pleased them when children; and the two greatest men that ruled the state, were often seen on the sea-shore picking up light pebbles, and throwing them on the smooth surface of the waters. Though fond of retirement and literary ease, yet Scipio often interested himself in the affairs of the state. His enemies accused him of aspiring to the dictatorship, and the clamours were most loud against him when he had opposed the Sempronian law, and declared himself the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was seen with pleasure by the friends of the republic, and not only the senate, but also the citizens, the Latins, and the neighbouring states conducted their illustrious friend and patron to his house. It seemed also the universal wish that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorship, and many presumed that that honour would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were frustrated, Scipio was found dead in his bed to the astonishment of the world; and those who inquired for the causes of this sudden death, perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been strangled, B. C. 128. This assassination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who supported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with having introduced the murderers into his room. No inquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favourite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to show their concern by their cries and loud lamentations.

The second Africanus has often been compared to the first of that name; they seemed to be equally great and equally meritorious, and the Romans were unable to distinguish which of the two was entitled to a greater share of their regard and admiration. Æmilianus, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he saved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compositions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midst of his greatness he died poor, and his nephew, Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his estate, scarce found in his house thirty-two pounds weight of silver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his sister deserves the greatest commendations, and indeed no higher encomium can be passed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his sons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greatest man that ever lived or should live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—Cic. de Senec. Orat. in Brut. &c.—Polyb.—Appian.—Paterc. 1, c. 12, &c.—Flor.—A son of the first Africanus, taken captive by Antiochus, king of Syria, and restored to his father without a ransom. He adopted as his son young Æmilianus, the son of Paulus Æmilius, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus. Like his father Scipio, he distinguished himself by his fondness for literature and his valour in the Roman armies.—Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and afterwards retired to Africa with Cato. He was defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus. Plut.—Salutio, a mean person in Cæsar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or because there was an ancient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.—L. Cornelius, a consul who opposed Sylla. He was at last deserted by his army, and proscribed.

SCIRA, an annual solemnity observed at Athens in honour of Minerva, or, according to others, of Ceres and Proserpine. It received its name either from Sciras, a small town of Attica, or from a native of Eleusis, called Scirus.

SCIRADIUM, a promontory of Attica on the Saronicus Sinus.

SCIRAS, a name of Ægina. Minerva was also called Sciras. Strab. 9.

SCIRON, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the highest rocks into the sea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to wash his feet. Theseus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth as well as the sea refused to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for some time suspended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Saxa, situate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them which bore the name of Sciron, naturally small and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor Adrian. Some suppose that Ino threw herself into the sea from one of these rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cychreus, a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon the son of Æacus. *Ovid. 7. Met. v. 144. SCODRA, a town of Illyricum, where Gentius resided. [It stood at the opening of the lake Labealis, and is now called Scutari or Isodar.] Liv. 43, c. 20.

SCOMBRUS, a mountain of Thrace near Rhodope.

SCOPAS, an architect and sculptor of Ephesus, for some time employed in making the mausoleum which Artemisia raised to her husband, and which was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. One of his statues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 430 years before Christ. Paus. 1, c. 43, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 8.—Virg. 9, c. 9.—Plin. 34, c. 8, l. 36, c. 5.

SCORDISCI and SCORDISÆ, a people of Pannonia and Thrace, well known during the reign of the Roman emperors for their barbarity and uncivilized manners. They were fond of drinking human blood, and they generally sacrificed their captive enemies to their gods. [The Scordisci were a Celtic race, who migrated to this quarter from their original settlements in Gaul. They penetrated far into Mysia, and were probably the same with the Celts or Gauls whom Alexander encountered in his expedition towards the Ister.] Liv. 41, c. 19.—Strab. 7.—Flor. 3, c. 4.

SCOTI, the ancient inhabitants of Scotland, mentioned as different from the Picts. [It is generally conceded that the earliest inhabitants of Caledonia were a colony of the Celtæ, who are allowed by most writers to have been the first possessors of western Europe. Respecting the era of their arrival in North-Britain, and the route by which they reached the country, nothing is known. At the period of Agricola's invasion, their descendants appear to have been divided into twenty different clans, usually mentioned, however, in the Latin writers by the general name of Caledonians.] Claudian. de Hon. 3, cons. v. 54.

SCRIBONIA, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Augustus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was some time after repudiated, that Augustus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before she became the wife of the emperor. Sueton. in Aug. 62.

SCRIBONIUS, a man who made himself master of the kingdom of Bosphorus.—A physician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius.—A man who wrote annals, A. D. 22.

The best edition of Scribonius is that of Patav. 4to. 1655.

SCULTENNA, a river of Gallia Cispadana, falling into the Po, now called Panaro. Liv. 41, c. 12 and 18.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

SCYLACIUM, a town of the Brutii, built by Mnestheus at the head of an Athenian colony, [situate on the Sinus Scyllacius, south-west of Crotona. It now called Squillac.] As Virgil has applied the epithet Navifragum to Scylacium, some suppose that either the poet was mistaken in his knowledge of the place, because there are no apparent dangers to navigation there, or that he confounds this place with a promontory of the same name on the Tuscan Sea. Servius explains this passage by supposing that the houses of the place were originally built with the shipwrecked vessels of Ulysses's fleet, (a most puerile explanation!) [Heyne considers the appellation navifragum to have been applied by Virgil to Scylacium, either in allusion to the rocky and dangerous shore in its vicinity, or to the frequent storms which prevailed in this quarter and near the adjacent promontories of Cocintum and the Japyges. The idea of a promontory called Scylacium he condemns.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 553.—Strab. 6.

SCYLAX, [a celebrated geographer and mathematician of Caryander in Caria. He is noticed by Herodotus, in a passage where the latter speaks of various discoveries made in Asia by Darius, son of Hystaspes, and tells of Scylax of Caryander being sent by that monarch along with others to ascertain where the Indus entered the sea. He makes them to have reached the Indus, sailed down the river to the sea, and then continuing their voyage on the sea towards the west, to have reached in the thirtieth month the place from which the Phœnician king despatched the Phœnicians to circumnavigate Africa. Suidas gives a very brief account of Scylax, in which he has evidently confounded different persons of the same name. "Scylax of Caryander, a mathematician and musician, wrote a periplus of the coast beyond the pillars of Hercules, a book respecting the Heraclidæ, a description of the circuit of the earth, and an answer to Polybius's History." The periplus, which still remains, bearing the name of Scylax, is a brief survey of the countries along the shores of the Mediterranean and Euxine, together with part of the western coast of Africa, surveyed by Hanno, as far as the island of Cerne. It concludes with an account of the passages across the sea, from Greece to Asia, and an enumeration of twenty important islands, in the order of their magnitude. A question has been raised whether the periplus remaining is the work of the ancient Scylax or of some latter writer. The probability is that it is the composition of a later age than that in which the ancient Scylax flourished. This periplus has reached us in a corrupted state. The best edition is that of Gronovius, L. Bat.

SCYLLA, a daughter of Nisus, king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch besieged her father's capital. To make him sensible of her passion, she informed him that she would deliver Megara into his hands if he promised to marry her. Minos consented, and as the prosperity of Megara depended on a golden hair which was on the head of Nisus, Scylla cut it off as her father was asleep, and from that moment the sallies of the Megareans were unsuccessful, and the enemy easily became masters of the place. Scylla was disappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with such contempt and ridicule that she threw herself from a tower into the sea, or, according to other accounts, she was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 393.—Paus. 2, c. 34.—Propert. 3, el. 19, v. 21.—Hygin. fab. 198.—Virg. G. 1, v. 405, &c.—A daughter of Typhon, or, as some say, of Phoreys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Scylla scorned the addresses of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whose knowledge of herbs and incantations was universally admired. Circe no sooner saw him than she became enamoured of him, and instead of giving him the required assistance, she attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To punish her rival, Circe poured the juice of some poisonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no sooner had the nymph touched the place, than she found every part of her body below the waist changed into frightful monsters like dogs, which never ceased barking. The rest of her body assumed an equally hideous form. She found herself supported by twelve feet, and she had six different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This sudden metamorphosis so terrified her, that she threw herself into that part of the sea which separates the coast of Italy and Sicily, where she was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were universally deemed by the ancients as very dangerous to sailors, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis on the coast of Sicily. During a tempest the waves are described by modern navigators as roaring dreadfully when driven in the rough and uneven cavities of the rock. SCYLLEUM, a promontory of Peloponnesus on the coast of Argolis, [opposite to the Attic promontory of Sunium. It is now Cape Skyllæo.] which had been shipwrecked in the Persian ships near Pelium. It is said that he could dive 80 stadia under the water. Herodot. 8, c. 8.—Paus. 10, c. 19.

SCYLLIS and DIPENUS, statuaries of Crete before the age of Cyrus, king of Persia. They were said to be sons and pupils of Dædalus, and they established a school at Sicyon, where they taught the principles of their profession. Paus.—Plin. 36, c. 4.

SCYLÜRUS, a monarch who left 80 sons. He called them to his bed-side as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of sticks tied together, and afterwards separately, he convinced them, that when altogether firmly united their power would be insuperable, but if ever disunited, they would fall an easy prey to their enemies. Plut. de garr.

SCYRIAS, a name applied to Deidamia as a native of Scyros. Ovid. A. 1, v. 682.

SCYROS, a rocky and barren island in the Ægean, at the distance of about 28 miles north-east from Eubœa, sixty miles in circumference. It was originally in the possession of the Pelasgians and Carians. Achilles retired there not to go to the Trojan war, and became father of Neoptolemus by Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes. Scyros was conquered by the Athenians under Cimon. Homer. Od. 10, v. 508.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 464, l. 13, v. 156.—Paus. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 9.

SCYTHÆ, the inhabitants of Scythia. vid. Scythia.

SCYTHES, or SCYTHA, a son of Jupiter by a daughter of Tellus. Half his body was that of a man, the rest that of a serpent. He became king of a country which he called Scythia. Diod. 2.

SCYTHIA, [a general name given by the ancient Greeks and Romans to a large portion of Asia, and divided by them into Scythia intra and extra Imaum, that is, on either side of Mount Imaus. According to Mannert, the former division was bounded on the west by the Rha and Asiatic Sarmatia, on the north by unknown countries, on the east by a part of the chain of Imaus, and on the south by the country of the Sacæ, by Sogdiana, Margiana, and the Caspian. Scythia extra Imaum was bounded on the north by unknown countries, on the west by Imaus, on the south by the mountains which form the northern boundary of India extra Gangem, and on the east by Serica. The Scythians have been considered by some writers as the same people with the Gomerians, and as being the descendants of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet. Their name is derived by some from the Teutonic, Schelen or Schwen, "to shoot," in which art this nation were very expert; hence the name of Scythian or archer. Sir W. Jones, however, observes, that Scythian was a name given them by others, not one which they used themselves.] The Scythians were divided into several nations or tribes, they had no cities, but continually changed their habitations. They inured themselves to bear labour and fatigue; they des-pired money, and lived upon milk, and covered themselves with the skins of their cattle. The virtues seemed to flourish among them, and that philosophy and moderation which other nations wished to acquire by study, seemed natural to them. Some authors, however, represent them as a savage and barbarous people, who fed upon human flesh, who drank the blood of their enemies, and used the skulls of travellers as vessels in their sacrifices to their gods. The Scythians made several irruptions upon the more southern provinces of Asia, especially B. C. 624, when they remained in possession of Asia Minor for 28 years, and we find them at different periods extending their conquests in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt. Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their sovereigns was unparalleled. When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in solemn procession, and afterwards buried. In the first centuries after Christ they invaded the Roman empire with the Sarmatians. *vid. Sarmatia. Herodot. 1, c. 4, &c. — Strab. 7. — Diod. 2. — Val. Max. 5, c. 4. — Justin. 2, c. 1, &c. — Ovid. SEBENNÛTUS, a town of the Delta in Egypt. That branch of the Nile which flows near it has been called the Sebennytic. Plin. 5, c. 10.

SEBËTUS, a small river of Campania, falling into the bay of Naples, whence the epithet Sebethis given to one of the nymphs who frequented its borders and became mother of Cebalus by Telon. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

SEDITANI, or SEDENTANI, a people of Spain, [supposed to have been the same with the Edetani.] Ital. 3, v. 372.

SEDÛNI, [a nation of Gaul on the south bank of the Rhodanus, to the east of Lacus Lemanus. They opposed Hannibal near the very summit of the Alps when he crossed these lofty mountains to invade Italy. Their capital was afterwards called civitas Sedunorum, now Sion. They appear to have sent out numerous colonies, in quest, no doubt, of a milder climate. Hence we find tribes of this name in various places.] Cæs. Bell. G. 3.

ÆLIUS SEJANUS, a native of Vulsinii in Tuscany, who distinguished himself in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the prætorian guards. His mother was descended from the Junian family. Sejanus first gained the favours of Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards he attached himself to the interest and the views of Tiberius, who then sat on the imperial throne. The emperor, who was naturally of a suspicious temper, was free and open with Sejanus, and while he distrusted others, he communicated his greatest secrets to this fawning favourite. Sejanus improved this confidence, and when he had found that he possessed the esteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favourite of the soldiers and the darling of the senate. As commander of the prætorian guards he was the second man in Rome, and in that important office he made use of insinuations and every mean artifice to make himself beloved and revered. His affability and condescension gained him the hearts of the common soldiers, and by appointing his own favourites and adherents to places of trust and honour, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his interest. The views of Sejanus in this were well known; yet, to advance with more success, he attempted to gain the affection of the senators. In this he met with no opposition. A man who has the disposal of places of honour and dignity, and who has the command of the public money, cannot but be a favourite of those who are in need of his assistance. It is even said, that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the senators, by a private and most secret promise of marriage to each of them, whenever he had made himself independent and sovereign of Rome. Yet, however successful with the best and noblest families in the empire, Sejanus had to combat numbers in the house of the emperor; but these seeming obstacles were soon removed. All the children and grand-children of Tiberius were sacrificed to the ambition of the favourite under various pretences; and Drusus, the son of the emperor, by striking Sejanus, made his destruction sure and inevitable. Livia, the wife of Drusus, was gained by Sejanus, and though the mother of many children, she was prevailed upon to assist her adulterer in the murder of her husband, and she consented to marry him when Drusus was dead. No sooner was Drusus poisoned than Sejanus openly declared his wish to marry Livia. This was strongly opposed by Tiberius; and the emperor, by recommending Germanicus to the senators for his successor, rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands; and when he could not gain the consent of the emperor, he persuaded him to retire to solitude from the noise of Rome and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of ease and luxury, yielded to his representations, and retired to Campania, leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favourite, and he was now without a master. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wished to be, but Sejanus offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependent prince of the island of Capreae, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the designs of Sejanus, and when he had been informed that his favourite had the meanness and audacity to ridicule him by introducing him on the stage, the emperor ordered him to be accused before the senate. Sejanus was deserted by all his pretended friends as soon as by fortune; and the man who aspired to the empire, and who called himself the favourite of the people, the darling of the praetorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was seized without resistance, and the same day strangled in prison, A. D. 31. His remains were exposed to the fury and insolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius sacrificed to his resentment and suspicions all those who were even connected with Sejanus, or had shared his favours and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. 3, Ann. &c.—Dio. 53—Suet. in Tib.

CN. SEIUS, a Roman who had a famous horse, of large size and uncommon beauty. He was put to death by Antony, and it was observed, that whoever obtained possession of his horse, which was supposed to be of the same race as the horses of Diomedes destroyed by Hercules, and which was called Sejanus equus, became unfortunate, and lost all his property, with every member of his family. Hence arose the proverb, ille homo habet Sejanum equum, applied to such as were op-

SELEUCĒNA, or SELEUCIS, a country of Syria, in Asia. vid. Seleucis.

SELEUCIA, [a famous city of Asia, built by Seleucus, one of Alexander's generals, and situate on the western bank of the Tigris, about 45 miles north of ancient Babylon. It was the capital of the Macedonian conquests in Upper Asia, and is said to have been the first and principal cause of the destruction of Babylon. Pliny reports that the intention of Seleucus was to raise, in opposition to Babylon, a Greek city with the privilege of being free. Many ages after the fall of the Macedonian empire, Seleucia retained the genuine characteristics of a Grecian colony, arts, military virtue, and the love of freedom. Its population consisted of 600,000 citizens, governed by a senate of 300 nobles. The rise of Ctesiphon, however, in its immediate vicinity, proved injurious to Seleucia; but it received its death-blow from the Romans A. D. 165, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. The Roman generals were received as friends by the Greek colony, and attacked as enemies the seat of the Parthian kings at Ctesiphon, and yet both cities experienced the same treatment. The sack and conflagration of Seleucia, with the massacre of 300,000 of the inhabitants, tarnished the glory of the Roman armies, though it was alleged in their favour that the inhabitants of Seleucia had first violated their faith. vid. Ctesiphon.]—[A city of Syria on the sea-coast, near the mouth of the Orontes, and south-west of Antioch. It was called Pieria, from Mount Pierus in its vicinity, in order to distinguish it from other cities of the same name, of which there were nine, founded by Seleucus. Browne identifies Seleucia with Sundea, the port of Antioch, about four hours journey distant from it. It is now in a neglected state and useless for commerce.]—[A city of Cilicia Trachea. on the Calycadnus. It is sometimes, for distinction sake, termed Trachea. [Its modern name is Seletheh.] Flor. 3, c. 11.—Plut. in Dem.—Mela, 1, c. 12.—Strab. 11 and 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

SELEUCIDÆ, a surname given to those monarchs who sat on the throne of Syria, which was founded by Seleucus the son of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B. C. 312, and ends at the conquest of Syria by Pompey, B. C. 65. The order in which these monarchs reigned is shown in the account of Syria. vid. Syria.

SELEUCIS, a division of Syria, which received its name from Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian empire after the death of Alexander the Great. It was also called Tetrapolis, from the four cities it contained, called also sister cities; Seleucia called after Seleucus, Antioch called after his father, Laodicea after his mother, and Apamea after his wife. Strab. 16.

SELEUCUS 1st, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, surnamed Nicator, or Victorious, was son of Antiochus. After the king's death, he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to destroy Eumenes as he passed through his territories, rendered him so unpopular that he fled for safety to the court of his friend Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was soon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had seized in his absence, and he increased his dominions by the immediate conquest of Media, and some of the neighbouring provinces. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war against Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and slain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became master of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch in honour of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He also made war against Demetrius and Lysimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice, the daughter of the former, and had lived in the closest friendship with the latter. Seleucus was at last murdered by one of his servants called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he bestowed the greatest favours, and whom he had distinguished by acts of the most unbounded confidence. According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greatest and most powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander. His benevolence has been commended; and it has been observed, that he conquered not to enslave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no less than 34 cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whose national industry, learning, religion, and spirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks, he restored to the Athenians the library and statues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were those of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the Christian era, in the 32d year of his reign, and the 78th, or, according to others, the 73d year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finish his days in peace and tranquillity in that province where he was born. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter. Justin. 13, c. 4, l. 15, c. 4, l. 16, c. 3, &c — Plut. in Dem. — Plin. 6, c. 17. — Paus. 3, c. 51. — Joseph. Ant. 12. — The 2d, surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father Antiochus Theus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his fleet was shipwrecked in a violent storm, and his armies soon after conquered by his enemy. He was at last taken prisoner by Arsaces, an officer who made himself powerful by the dissensions which reigned in the house of the Seleucidæ, between the two brothers Seleucus and Antiochus; and after he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B. C. 226, after a reign of 20 years. Seleucus had received the surname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, ironically to express his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice, the sister of one of his generals, by whom he had two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Strab. 16. — Justin. 27. — Appian. de Syr. — The 3d, succeeded his father Seleucus 2d, on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus, by antiphrasis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irresolute monarch. He was murdered by two of his officers, after a reign of three years, B. C. 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of Great. Appian. — The 4th, succeeded his father Antiochus the Great on the throne of Syria. He was surnamed Philopator, or, according to Josephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch, and the yearly tribute of a thousand talents to these victorious enemies concurred in lessening his power and consequence among nations. Seleucus was poisoned after a reign of 12 years, B. C. 175. His son Demetrius had been sent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab. 16. — Justin. 32. — Appian. — The 5th, succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age. He was put to death in the first year of his reign, by Cleopatra his mother, who had also sacrificed her husband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many historians in the number of the Syrian monarchs. — The 6th, one of the Seleucidæ, son of Antiochus Gryphus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who wished to obtain the crown of Syria. He was some time after banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius, son of Cyzicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace by the inhabitants, B. C. 93. Appian. — Joseph. — A prince of Syria, to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Auletes. Seleucus accepted it, but he soon disgusted his subjects, and received the surname of Cybiosactes, or, Sculhon, for his meanness and avarice. He was at last murdered by Berenice, whom he had married.

SELGE, [the largest and most powerful of the cities of Pisidia, situate north of the Eurymedon. It is said by some of the ancient writers to have been founded by a Lacedæmonian colony. The probability, however, is, that this was a mere supposition, grounded upon the valour of the inhabitants, since, independent of the difficulty of establishing a colony in an inland and mountainous country, amid rude and savage tribes, we find Arrian expressly styling the inhabitants of Selga Barbarians, when making mention of an embassy sent by them to Alexander. In a later age, however, we find the people of Selga laying open claim to the honour of a Spartan origin, and even adding to their medals the name of Lacedæmon.]

SELINUS, or SELINUS, (untis.) a [large and flourishing city of Sicily, founded by a colony from Hybla. It was situate on the southern shore of the western part of the island, south-west from Lilybæum. Virgil styles it palmosa, from the number of palm-trees which grew in its vicinity. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians; a great number of the inhabitants being at the same time massacred and the remainder carried into captivity. The city derived its name from the river Selinus adjacent to it, which was so called from the quantity of parsley (σέλινον) which grew on its banks.] The marks of its ancient consequence are visible in the venerable ruins now found in its neighbourhood [Near the ruins of the city are to be seen the remains of the Thermæ Selinuntia, or warm baths of Selinus, at a place called Sciacca.] *Virg. SELLASIA, [a town of Laconia, north-east of Sparta, and commanding one of the principal passes into the country. It was situate on the Cenus. A famous battle was fought in its vicinity, between the combined forces of the Achæans and Macedonians, commanded by Antigonus, and the Spartans under Cleomenes. The latter were entirely defeated. The town of Sellasia was destroyed by Aratus.] Plut.

SELLEIS, a river of Peloponnesus falling into the Ionian Sea. Homer. II.

SELYMERIA, a town of Thrace, on the Propontis. It lay to the east of Perinthus, and is now called Selibria.] Liv. 39, c. 39.

SÈMELE, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus. She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter; but Juno, who was always jealous of her husband's amours, and who hated the house of Cadmus because they were related to the goddess of beauty, determined to punish the successful rival. She borrowed the girdle of Ate, which contained every wickedness, deceit, and perfidy, and in the form of Beroe, Semele's nurse, she visited the house of Jupiter's mistress. Semele listened with attention to the artful admonitions of the false Beroe, and was at last persuaded to entreat her lover to come to her arms with the same majesty as he approached Juno. This rash request was heard with horror by Jupiter; but as he had sworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever she required, he came to her bed, attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. The mortal nature of Semele could not endure so much majesty, and she was instantly consumed with fire. The child, however, of which she was pregnant, was saved from the flames by Mercury, or, according to others, by Dirce, one of the nymphs of the Achelous, and Jupiter placed him in his thigh the rest of the time which he ought to have been in his mother's womb. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionysius. Semele immediately after death was honoured with immortality under the name of Thyone. Some, however, suppose that she remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus her son was permitted to bring her back. There were in the temple of Diana, at Trœzene, two altars raised to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture, through which, as Pausanias reports, Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worshipped at Brasia in Laconia, where, according to a certain tradition, she had been driven by the winds with her son, after Cadmus had exposed her on the sea, on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter. The mother of Bacchus, though she received divine honours, had no temples; she had a statue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes, in Bœotia. Paus. 3, c. 24, l. 9, c. 5.—*Hesiod. Theog. SÈMIRÀMIS, a celebrated queen of Assyria, daughter of the goddess Derceto, by a young Assyrian. She was exposed in a desert, but her life was preserved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the shepherds of Ninus, found her and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis, when grown up, married Menones, the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, she hastened the king's operations and took the city. Those eminent services, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch asked her of her husband, and offered him instead, his daughter Sosana; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refused, and when Ninus had added threats to entreaties, he hung himself. No sooner was Menones dead than Semiramis, who was of an aspiring soul, married Ninus, by whom she had a son called Ninyas. Ninus was so fond of Semiramis, that at her request he resigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and sole empress of Assyria. Of this, however, he had cause to repent: Semiramis put him to death, the better to establish herself on the throne, and when she had no enemies to fear at home, she began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means Babylon became the most superb and magnificent city in the world. She visited every part of her dominions, and left every where immortal monuments of her greatness.

and benevolence. To render the roads passable, and communication easy, she hollowed mountains and filled up vallies, and water was conveyed at a great expense by large and convenient aqueducts to barren desert and unfruitful plains. She was not less distinguished as a warrior, many of the neighbouring nations were conquered; and when Semiramis was once told, as she was dressing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, she left her toilette with precipitation, and though only half dressed, she refused to have the rest of her head adorned before the sedition was quelled, and tranquillity re-established. Semiramis has been accused of licentiousness, and some authors have observed, that she regularly called the strongest and stoutest men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death that they might not be living witnesses of her incontinence. Her passion for her son was also unnatural, and it was this criminal propensity which induced Ninus to destroy his mother with his own hands. Some say that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honours in Assyria. It is supposed that she lived about 1965 years before the Christian era, and that she died in the 62d year of her age, and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and some have declared that for some time she disguised herself and passed for her son Ninus. *Val. SEMNONES, [called by Strabo Σειμωνες, by Ptolemy Σεμωνες, by Velleius Paterculus Senones, and by Tacitus Semnones. They were a German nation, located by Paterculus in the vicinity of the Albis or Elbe, and, according to Ptolemy's account, would seem to have inhabited what is now Brandenburg. They originally formed a part of the kingdom of M. robodius, but afterwards separated from it along with Langobardi. Manneri is of opinion, that the name of Semnones was given by the German tribes, not to a single nation, but to all the nations in the vicinity of the Elbe, from whom the more southern Germans were descended. The Semnones must not be confounded with the Senones, a Celtic race who settled on the coast of Umbria. vid. Senones.]

SEMONES, inferior deities of Rome, that were not in the number of the 15 great gods. Among these were Fannus, the Satyr, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all such illustrious heroes as had received divine honours after death. The word seems to be the same as semi homines, because they were inferior to the supreme gods, and superior to men. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

SEMOSANCIUS, one of the gods of the Romans among the Indigetes, or such as were born and educated in their country.

SEMPRONIA, a sister of the Gracchi, who is accused of having assisted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus, and Flaccus, to murder her husband Scipio Africanus the younger.

SEMPRONIA LEX de magistratibus, by C. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 630, ordained that no person who had been legally deprived of a magistracy for misdemeanors, should be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.—Another, de civitate, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment should be passed over a Roman citizen without the concurrence and authority of the senate. There were also some other regulations included in this law.

—Another, de comitiis, by the same, A. U. C. 635. It ordained that in giving their votes, the centuries should be chosen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their classes.

—Another, de comitiis, by the same, the same year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome the privilege of giving their votes at elections as if they were Roman citizens.

—Another, de provinciis, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the senators should be proposed to the consuls, to be divided by lot, and that the tribunes should be deprived of the power of interposing against a decree of the senate.—Another, Agraria prima, by T. Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A. U. C. 620. It confirmed the lex Agraria Licinia, and enacted that all such as were in possession of more lands than that law allowed, should immediately resign them to be divided among the poorer citizens. Three commissioners were appointed to put this law into execution, and its consequences were so violent, as it was directly made against the nobles and senators, that it cost the author his life.—Another, called Agraria altera, by the same. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treasury of Attalus king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, should be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to supply them with the various instruments requisite in husbandry, and that the lands of that monarch should be divided among the people.—Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn should be distributed among the people, so much to every individual, for which it was required that they should only pay the trifling sum of a semissis and a triens.—Another, de usura, by M. Sempronius the tribune, A. U. C. 560. It ordained that in lending money to the Latins, and the allies of Rome, the Roman law should be observed as well as among the citizens.—Another, de iudicibus, by the tribune C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that the right of judging, which had been assigned to the Senatorian order by Romulus, should be transferred from them to the Roman knights.—Another, militaris, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the soldiers should be clothed at the public expense, without any diminution of their usual pay. It also ordered that no person should be obliged to serve in the army before the age of 17.

SEMPRŌNIUS (A. ATRATINUS), a senator who opposed the Agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius, soon after the election of the tribunes.—L. Atratinus, consul, A. U. C. 311. He was one of the first censors with his colleague in the consulship, Papius.—A legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought in the field against Annibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.—Tiberius Longus, a Roman consul defeated by the Carthaginians in an engagement which he had begun against the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.—Tiberius Gracchus, a consul, who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Hannibal showed great honour to his remains; a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.—The father of the Gracchi. [vid. Gracchus.]—An emperor. [vid. Saturninus.]

SENA, or [SENAGALLICA, now Senigaglia.] a town of Umbria in Italy, on the Adriatic, built by the Senones, after they had made an irruption into Italy, A. U. C. 396; and on that account called Gallica. There was also a small river in the neighbourhood which bore the name of Sena. C. Nep. in Catone.—Sil. 3, v. 454.—Liv. 27, c. 46.—Cic. Brut. 18.

SĒNĀTUS, the chief council of the state among the Romans. The members of this body, called senators on account of their age, and patres on account of their authority, were of the greatest consequence in the republic. The senate was first instituted by Romulus, to govern the city, and to preside over the affairs of the state during his absence. This was continued by his successors; but Tarquin the second disdained to consult them, and by having his own counsel chosen from his favourites, and men who were totally devoted to his interest, he diminished the authority and the consequence of the senators, and slighted the concurrence of the people. The senators whom Romulus created, were an hundred, to whom afterwards were added the same number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. [This is rather doubtful, since Livy expressly states that there were only 100 senators at the death of Romulus, and that their number was increased by Tullus Hostilius, after the destruction of Alba. Tarquinius Priscus added 100 more.] After the expulsion of the last Tarquin, whose tyranny had thinned the patricians as well as the plebeians, 164 new senators were chosen to complete the 300; they were called conscripti.

ti. [These conscripti were chosen into the senate by Brutus. Their name indicates that they were written or enrolled together with the old senators, who alone were properly styled patres. Hence the custom of summoning to the senate those who were patres, and those who were conscripti. Hence, also, the name patres conscripti, (sc. et.) was afterwards usually applied to all the senators. The number of 300 continued with small variation to the time of Sylla, who increased it, but how many he added is uncertain. It appears that there were at least above 400. In the time of Julius Cæsar, the number of senators was increased to 900, and after his death to 1,000; but many worthless persons having obtained admittance into the senate during the civil wars, Augustus reduced the number to 600.] The place of a senator was always bestowed upon merit; the monarchs had the privilege of choosing the members, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins it was one of the rights of the consuls, till the election of the censors, who from their office seemed most capable of making choice of men whose characters were irreproachable, whose morals were pure, and relations honourable. There was a dictator chosen to fill up the number of the senate, after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the senate, and when the plebeians were permitted to share the honours of the state, it was then required that they should be born of free citizens; [no one could be admitted into the senate who had exercised a low trade, or whose father had been a slave. Appius Claudius first disgraced the senate by electing into it the sons of freedmen; but this election was not deemed of any value, and the next consuls called the senate according to the old roll. Freedmen, however, were admitted towards the end of the republic; and, in Cæsar's time, not only his officers, but even his mercenary soldiers, were admitted. The proper senatorial age was probably not below thirty; it cannot, however, be ascertained with certainty.] The candidate must have probably passed through the inferior offices of quaestor, tribune of the people, prætor, and consul. Some, however, suppose that the senators whom Romulus chose were all old men; yet his successors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of 30 were admitted by courtesy into the senate. The dignity of a senator could not be supported without the possession of 800,000 sesterces, or about 7000*l.* English money, and therefore such as squandered away their money, and whose fortune was reduced below this sum, were generally struck out of the list of senators. This regulation was not made in the first ages of the republic, when the Romans boasted of their poverty. [Augustus raised the senatorial fortune to 1,200,000 sesterces, and supplied the deficiency to those who had not that sum.] The senators were not permitted to be of any trade or profession. They were distinguished from the rest of the people by their dress; they wore the laticlave, [a white tunic, or waistcoat, with an oblong broad stripe of purple, like a ribband, sewed to it. It was broad, to distinguish it from the equites who wore a narrow one,] half boots of a black colour, with a crescent or silver buckle in the form of a C, [indicative of the ancient number of the senate, one hundred, (Centum).] They had the sole right of feasting publicly in the capitol in ceremonial habits; they sat in curule chairs, and, at the representation of plays and public spectacles, they were honoured with particular seats, [called Orchestra; next the stage in the theatre, and next the arena in the amphitheatre. In the games of the Circus they sat promiscuously with the people until the emperor Claudius assigned them peculiar seats there also.] Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own business, they were maintained at the public expense, and always found provisions for themselves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public festivals they wore the prætecta, or long white robe with purple borders. The right of assembling the senate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, to the consuls, [and in their absence by the prætors,] the dictator, master of the horse, and tribunes of the people; but no magistrate could exercise this privilege except in the absence of a superior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Augustus they were not assembled on the nones, [and in the sickly months of September and October, only a chosen number chosen by lot attended. This was done for the ostensible purpose of diminishing the weight of their duties, but in reality to lessen the power of the senators.] It was requisite that the place where they assembled should have been previously consecrated by the augurs. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Castor and Pollux, &c. or in the Curia, called Hostilia, Julia Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambassadors, the senators assembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the same ceremony as to their meeting was also observed when they transacted business with their generals, as the ambassadors of foreign nations; and the commanders of armies, while in commission, were not permitted to appear within the walls of the city. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requisite, and such as were absent without some proper cause were fined. In the reign of Augustus, 400 senators were requisite to make a senate. Nothing was transacted before sun-rise, or after sun-set. In their office the senators were the guardians of religion, they disposed of the provinces as they pleased, they prorogued the assemblies of the people, they appointed thanksgivings, nominated their ambassadors, distributed the public money, and in short, had the management of every thing political or civil in the republic, except the creating of magistrates, the enacting of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which were confined to the assemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings; the chief magistrates of the states, such as the consuls, the prætors, and censors, sat first, after these the inferior magistrates, such as the ediles and questors, and last of all, those that then exercised no office in the state. [The order of rank in asking opinions was as follows, Consulares, Prætorii, Ædilitii, Tribunitii, and Quæstorii. He whose name was first entered on the Censor's books was called Princeps Senatûs, which title used to be given to the person who of those alive had been censor first; but after the year of the city 544, to him whom the censors thought most worthy. This individual was usually asked his opinion first, unless a consul elect chanced to be present, to whom that privilege was always extended.] In the age of Cæsar, he was permitted to speak first till the end of the year, on whom the consul had originally conferred that honour. Under the emperors the same rules were observed, but the consuls were generally consulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the senate, which was always called referre ad senatum, any senator whose opinion was asked, was permitted to speak upon it as long as he pleased, and on that account it was often usual for the senators to protract their speeches till it was too late to determine. When the question was put, they passed to the side of that speaker whose opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was easily collected, without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in alicujus sententiam ire, and therefore on that account, the senators who had not the privilege of speaking, but only the right of giving a silent vote, such as bore some curule honours, and on that account were permitted to sit in the senate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii senatores. [According to others, the pedarii senatores were they who, because they had not borne any curule office, came to the senate on foot. This, however, is opposed by a passage in Pliny, N. H. 7, c. 43.] After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and a senatûs-consultum was immediately written by the clerks of the house, at the feet of the chief magistrates, and it was signed by all the principal members of the house. [It is more correct to say that the names of these senators who had been most strenuous in favour of the bill were subscribed to it, they staying to see it made out. If any person interceded, the decision of the senate was styled senatus auctoritas; so also, if the senate was held at an improper time or place, or if all the usual formalities were not observed. But when no mention is made of intercession or informality, Auctoritas senatûs is the same as senatus consultum. They are also sometimes joined, senatus consulti auctoritas, which was the usual inscription of the decrees of the senate, and marked with the initial letters S. C. A.] The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could stop the debates, and the decrees of the assembled senate, as also any one who was of equal authority with him who had proposed the matter. The senatus consulta were left in the custody of the consuls, who could suppress or preserve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always deposited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treasury, by the ediles of the people. The degradation of the senators was made by the censor, by omitting their names when he called over the list of the senate. This was called præterer. A senator could be again introduced into the senate if he could repair his character or fortune, which had been the causes why the censor had lawfully called him unqualified, and had challenged his opposition. The meeting of the senate was often sudden, except the particular time already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of J. Cæsar, they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called parricidium, because on that day the dictator had been assassinated. The sons of senators, after they had put on the toga virilis, were permitted to come into the senate, but this was afterwards limited. (vid. Papirius.) The rank and authority of the senators, which were so conspicuous in the first ages of the republic, and which caused the minister of Pyrrhus to declare that the Roman senate was a venerable assembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the lowest character were admitted into the senate; the emperors took pleasure in robbing this illustrious body of their privileges and authority, and the senators themselves, by their meanness and servility, contributed as much as the tyranny of the sovereign to diminish their own consequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer possessed sufficient prudence or authority to be consulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of successors to the imperial purple after Augustus, the approbation of the senate was consulted, but it was only a matter of courtesy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the control of a mercenary army. The title of Clarissimus was given to the senators under the emperors, and indeed this was the only distinction they had in compensation for the loss of their independence. The senate was abolished by Justinian, 13 centuries after its first institution by Romulus.

SENÆCA, M. ANNÆUS, a native of Corduba in Spain, who married Helvia, a woman of Spain, by whom he had three sons, Seneca the philosopher, Annæus Novatus, and Annæus Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca made himself known by some declama-tions of which he made a collection from the most celebrated orators of the age, and from that circumstance, and for distinction, he obtained the appellation of declamator. He left Corduba and went to Rome, where he became a Roman knight. His son L. Annæus Seneca, who was born about six years before Christ, was early distinguished by his extraordinary talents. He was taught eloquence by his father, and received lessons in philosophy from the best and most celebrated stoics of the age. As one of the followers of the Pythagorean doctrines, Seneca observed the most reserved abstinence, and in his meals never eat the flesh of animals; but this he abandoned at the representation of his father, when Tiberius threatened to punish some Jews and Egyptians, who abstained from certain meats. In the character of a pleader, Seneca appeared with great advantage, but the fear of Caligula, who aspired to the name of an eloquent speaker, and who consequently was jealous of his fame, deterred him from pursuing his favourite study, and he sought a safer employment in canvassing for the honours and offices of the state. [It is said that Caligula spared the life of Seneca, because it was represented to him that his health was feeble and that he would be short-lived.] He was made quæstor, but the aspersions which were thrown upon him on account of an alleged amour with Julia Livilla, removed him from Rome, and the emperor banished him to Corsica. During his banishment the philosopher wrote some spirited epistles to his mother, remarkable for elegance of language and sublimity; but he soon forgot his philosophy, and disgraced himself by his flatteries to the emperor, and in wishing to be recalled, even at the expense of his innocence and character. The disgrace of Messalina at Rome, and the marriage of Agrippina with Claudius, proved favourable to Seneca, and after he had remained eight years in Corsica, he was recalled by the empress to take care of the education of her son Nero who was destined to succeed to the empire. In the honourable duty of preceptor, Seneca gained applause, and as long as Nero followed his advice, Rome enjoyed tranquillity, and believed herself safe and happy under the administration of the son of Agrippina. Some, however, are clamorous against the philosopher, and observe that Seneca initiated his pupil in those unnatural vices, and abominable indulgences, which disgraced him as a monarch and as a man. This may be the language of malevolence or the insinuation of jealousy. In the corrupted age of Nero, the preceptor had to withstand the clamours of many wicked and profligate ministers, and if he had been the favourite of the emperor, and shared his pleasures, his debauchery, and extravagance, Nero would not perhaps have been so anxious to destroy a man whose example, from vicious inclinations, he could not follow, and whose salutary precepts his licentious associates forbade him to obey. [Whatever opinion we may form of the other parts of Seneca's conduct, it was certainly unpardonable in the affair of Agrippina's murder. He appears not to have opposed this horrid deed as he should have done; and after it was perpetrated, he actually wrote to the senate in justification of it.] Seneca was too well acquainted with the natural disposition of Nero to think himself secure; he had been accused of having amassed the most ample riches, and of having built sumptuous houses and adorned beautiful gardens during the four years in which he had attended Nero as a preceptor, and therefore he desired his imperial pupil to accept of the riches and the possessions which his attendance on his person had procured, and to permit him to retire to solitude and study. Nero refused with artful duplicity, and Seneca, to avoid further suspicions, kept himself at home for some time as if labouring under a disease. In the conspiracy of Piso, which happened some time after, and in which some of the most noble of the Roman senators were concerned, Seneca's name was mentioned by Natalis, and Nero, who was glad of an opportunity of sacrificing him to his secret jealousy, ordered him to destroy himself. Seneca very probably was not accessory to the conspiracy, and the only thing that could be produced against him as a crimination was trivial and unsatisfactory. Piso, as Natalis declared, had complained that he never saw Seneca, and the philosopher had observed in answer, that it was not proper or conducive to their common interest to see one another often. He further pleaded indisposition, and said that his own life depended on the safety of Piso's person. Seneca was at table with his wife Paulina and two of his friends when the messenger from Nero arrived. He heard the words which commanded him to destroy himself with philosophical firmness, and even with joy, and observed, that such a mandate might have long been expected from a man who had murdered his own mother and assassinated all his friends. He wished to dispose of his possessions as he pleased, but this was refused, and when he heard this, he turned to his friends who were weeping at his melancholy fate, and told them, that since he could not leave them what he believed was his own, he would leave them at least his own life for an example, an innocent conduct which they might imitate, and by which they might acquire immortal fame.—Against their tears and wailings he exclaimed with firmness, and asked them whether they had not learned better to withstand the attacks of fortune and the violence of tyranny? As for his wife, he attempted to calm her emotions, and when she seemed resolved to die with him, he said he was glad to find his example followed with so much constancy. Their veins were opened at the same moment, but the life of Paulina was preserved, and Nero, who was partial to her, ordered the blood to be stopped, and from that moment, according to some authors, the philosopher's wife seemed to rejoice that she could still enjoy the comforts of life. [She never recovered the loss of blood which she experienced before the mandate to spare her life arrived.] Seneca's veins bled but slowly, and it has been observed, that the sensible and animated conversation of his dying moments was collected by his friends, and that it has been preserved among his works. To hasten his death he drank a dose of poison, but it had no effect, and therefore he ordered himself to be carried into a hot bath, to accelerate the operation of the draught, and to make the blood flow more freely. This was attended with no better success, and as the soldiers were clamorous, he was carried into a stove, and suffocated by the steam, on the 12th of April, in the 65th year of the Christian era, in his 53d year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he made when he enjoyed the most unbounded favours of Nero. The compositions of Seneca are numerous, and chiefly on moral subjects. He is so much admired for his refined sentiments and virtuous precepts, for his morality, his constancy, and his innocence of manners, that St. Jerome has not hesitated to rank him among Christian writers. His style is nervous, it abounds with ornament, and seems well suited to the taste of the age in which he lived. The desire of recommending himself and his writings to the world obliged him too often to depreciate the merit of the ancients, and to sink into obscurity. [Concerning the character of Seneca, a candid judge who considers the virtuous sentiments with which his writings abounds, the temperate and abstemious life which he led in the midst of a luxurious court, and the fortitude with which he met his fate, will not hastily pronounce him to have been guilty of adultery upon the evidence of the infamous Messalina, or conclude his wealth to have been the reward of a servile compliance with the base passions of his prince. It has been questioned whether Seneca ought to be ranked among the Stoic or Eclectic philosophers. It appears from the general tenor and spirit of his writings that he adhered in the main to the Stoic system. With regard to his literary merit, it may suffice to observe, that notwithstanding he is justly censured by Quintilian and other critics, as the first corrupter of style among the Romans, his works, nevertheless, are very valuable on account of the number and beauty of the moral sentiments which they contain, the extensive erudition which they discover, and the happy mixture of freedom and urbanity with which they censure vice and inculcate good morals.] His treatises are de irâ, de consolatione, de providentiâ, de tranquillitate animi, de clementiâ, de sapientis constantiâ, de otio sapientis, de brevitate vitæ, de beneficiis, de vitâ beatâ, besides his naturales quæstiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are also some tragedies ascribed to Seneca. Quintilian supposes that the Medea is his composition, and, according to others, the Troas and the Hippolytus were also written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyestes & Hercules in Oeta by his father Seneca the declaimer. [Lipsius has imagined that the Medea, which he regards as the best of these tragedies, was written by Seneca the philosopher, and that the rest were the productions of another of the same name, who lived in the time of Trajan. Most critics, following the first part of the hypothesis of Lipsius, assign the Medea to Seneca, but they likewise ascribe to him the Hippolytus, Agamemnon, and Troades; and some of them give this latter piece the preference to the Medea. The remaining tragedies they consider to be the productions of various writers, appended to the tragedies of Seneca by editors or copyists. As to these compositions, it is hardly possible to find a really good tragedy among them. All, even the Medea, are defective in plan and in the management of the piece; they are all barren of action, and full of declamation. We find in them, it is true, occasional bold thoughts, and expressions approaching the sublime, but they are often misplaced. They are modelled after the Greek tragedies, but are very far from being good copies, and are generally figuring by reason of the exaggeration and emphatic tone which reign throughout.] The best editions of Seneca are those of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amst. 1672; [to which may be added the excellent edition of Ruhkopf. Lips. 1797-1812, in 6 vols. 8vo;] and those of his tragedies, are that of Schröder's, 4to. Delph. 1728, the 8vo. of Gronovius, L. Bat. 1682, and that of Baden, Lips. 1821, 2 vols. 8vo.] Tacit. Ann. 12, &c.—Dio.—Sueton. in Ner. &c.—Quintil.

SENA, or SENA, a river of Umbria. vid. Sena. Lucan. 2, v. 407.

SENONES, an uncivilized nation of Gallia Transalpina, who left their native possessions [on the Sequana or Seine, about 70 miles from Paris.] and, under the conduct of Brennus, invaded Italy and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians, to make war against the Romans, till they were totally destroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they settled were Sena Gallica, Fanum Fortunæ, Pisaurum, and Ariminum. (vid. Cimbri.) Lucan. 1, v. 254.—Sil. 8, v. 454.—Liv. 5, c. 35, &c.—Flor.—A people of Germany. [vid. Semnones.]

SENTIA LEX de senâtu, by C. Sentius the consul, A. U. C. 734, enacted the choosing of proper persons to fill up the number of senators.

SENTIUS, CN. a Roman emperor. (vid. Severus.)—A writer in the reign of the emperor Alexander, of whose life he wrote an account in Latin, or, according to others, in Greek.

SEPIAS, a cape of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the north of Eubœa, now St. George.

SEPTEM AQUÆ, a portion of the lake near Reate. Cic. 4. Att. 15.—Fratres, a mountain of Mauritania, now Gebel-Mousa. Strab. 17.—Maria, the entrance of the seven mouths of the Po.

SEPTERION, a festival observed once in nine years at Delphi, in honour of Apollo. It was a representation of the pursuit of Pithon by Apollo, and of the victory obtained by the god.

TIT. SEPTIMIUS, a Roman knight distinguished by his poetical compositions, both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Augustus as well as Horace, who has addressed the 6th Ode of the 2d book to him.—A native of Africa, who distinguished himself at Rome as a poet. He wrote, among other things, an hymn in praise of Janus. Only eleven of his verses are preserved. M. Terent.—Crinitus in vita.

SEQUANA, a river of Gaul which separates the territories of the Belgæ and the Celtæ, and is now called la Seine. [The course of this river extends 250 miles.] Strab. 4.—Mela, 3, c. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 425.

SEQUANI, a people of Gaul near the territories of the Ædui, between the Saone and Mount Jura, famous for their wars against Rome, &c. (vid. Ædui.) Their country was called before the revolution Franche Compté, or Upper Burgundy.

SERAPIO, a surname given to one of the Scipios, because he resembled a swine-herd of that name.—A Greek poet who flourished in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.—An Egyptian put to death by Achillas, when he came at the head of an embassy from Ptolemy, who was a prisoner in the hands of J. Cæsar.

SERAPIS, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another, very rich, at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146, and the mysteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with so much licentiousness that the senate were soon after obliged to abolish them. Herodotus, who speaks in a very circumstantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. [vid. a learned and elaborate note in Dr Clark's "Travels in Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land," vol. 2, page 129, in which the identity of Serapis with the patriarch Joseph is endeavoured to be proved.] Paus. 1, c. 18, l. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial. 9, ep. 30.

SERBONIS, a lake between Egypt and Palestine, [and near Mount Casius. Pliny makes it to have been 150 miles long. Strabo assigns it 200 stadia of length and 50 of breadth. It had communicated with the Mediterranean by an opening which was filled up in the time of Strabo. The fable makes Typhon to have laid at the bottom of this lake or morass, and the Egyptians called its opening, "the breathing-hole of Typhon." This lake has taken the name of Sebaket-Bardouï, from a king of Jerusalem of that name, who died at Rhinocolura, on his return from an expedition into Egypt.

SERENA, a daughter of Theodosius who married Stilicho. She was put to death, &c. Claudian.

SERENUS SAMONICUS, a physician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his composition on medicine, the last edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo. Amst.

SERES, a nation of Asia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eastern ocean in the modern Thibet. [M. Malte-Brun considers the ancient Serica to have included the western parts of Thibet, Serinagur, Cashmere, little Thibet, and perhaps a small part of little Buckharia. In a note, however, by the English translator, a sounder doctrine is recognized. The opinion advocated by Malte-Brun is that of M. Gosse. It has, however, been rendered less probable by various subsequent discoveries made by British officers on the actual physical geography of the mountainous parts of Asia, which lie immediately to the north of India. Accordingly the opinion of M. Gosse has been combated by Mr. Hugh Murray, in a learned memoir, inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, vol. 3, p. 171, in which the Seres are maintained to be identical with the Chinese. The arguments are partly founded on a confidence in the general correctness of Ptolemy, as confirmed by these discoveries, which, while they subvert the views recently entertained, restore, so far as they go, the geography of that author. Mr. Murray has also recently published a separate work, entitled "An Historical account of Discoveries and Travels in Asia," in 3 vols. 8vo. We learn too from the Chinese historians, through M. De Guignes, that An-toun, i. e. Antoninus, emperor of the west, sent a commercial embassy to Oan-ti, who reigned in China about A. D. 150.] The Seres were naturally of a meek disposition. Silk, of which the fabrication was unknown to the ancients, who imagined that the materials were collected from the leaves of trees, was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dress of silk is called serica vestis. Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, was the first who wore a silk dress, which at that time sold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and consequently was the common dress among the Romans. Ptol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 10, v. 142 and 292.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

SERGIUS, one of the names of Catiline. —A military tribune at the siege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the several families of the Fidenates, Sili, Catilineæ, Natte, Ocellæ, and Planci.

SERIPHUS, an island in the Ægean Sea, [now Serpho, south-east of Cythnus,] about 36 miles in circumference, according to Pliny only 12, very barren and uncultivated. [Its mountains were so steep and rugged, that the poets feigned the natives to have been changed into stone by Perseus. It contains mines of iron and loadstones.] The Romans generally sent their criminals there in banishment, and it was there that Cassius Severus, the orator, was exiled, and there he died. According to Ælian, the frogs of this island never croaked, but when they were removed from the island to another place they were more noisy and clamorous than others; hence the proverb of spheria rana applied to a man who neither speaks nor sings. This, however, is found to be a mistake by modern travellers. It was on the coast of Seriphus that the chest was discovered in which Acrisius had exposed his daughter Danae, and her son Perseus. Strab. 10.—Ælian. Anim. 3, c. 37.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 21.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242, l. 7, v. 65.

SERRANUS, a surname given to Cincinnatus, because he was found sowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some, however, suppose that Serranus was a different person from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, c. 3.—Liv. 3, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844. —A poet of some merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 80.

QUINTUS SERTORIUS, a Roman general, son of Quintus and Rhea, born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He visited the enemy's camp as a spy, and had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valour that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. The Lusitanians universally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not show himself less attentive to their interest, by establishing public schools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans, who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. They were experimentally convinced of his valour and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he imposed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminish his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him every where, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives, alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, were driven with dishonour from the field. But the favourite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers, who was jealous of his fame and tired of a superior, conspired against him. At a banquet the conspirators began to open their intentions by speaking with freedom and licentiousness in the presence of Sertorius, whose age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glass of wine, as a signal to the rest of the conspirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers stabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the rest, 73 years before Christ. Sertorius has been commended for his love of justice and moderation. The flattering description he heard of the Fortunate Islands when he passed into the west of Africa, almost tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noise of war, and the clamours of envy, to end his days in the bosom of a peaceful and solitary island, had not the stronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been observed, that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we must confess that in affability, clemency, complaisance, generosity, and military valour, he not only surpassed his contemporaries, but the rest of the Romans. [Of Sertorius it has been justly remarked that his great qualities and military talents would have undoubtedly raised him to the first rank among the chiefs of his country had he been, not the leader of a party, but the commander of a state; with nothing to support him but the resources of his own mind, he created a powerful kingdom among strangers, and defended it for a long time against the arms of Rome, although wielded by the ablest generals of his time; and he displayed public and private virtues which would have rendered a people happy under his rule at a less turbulent period.] *Plut. in vitâ.—Paterc. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.—Val. SERVILIA, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Cæsar, though her brother was one of the most inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæsar of her affection, she sent him a letter filled with the most tender expressions of regard for his person. The letter was delivered to Cæsar in the senate-house, while they were debating about punishing the associates of Catiline's conspiracy; and when Cato saw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conspirators, and insisted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæsar gave it to Cato, and the stern senator had no sooner read its contents, than he threw it back with the words take it drunkard. From the intimacy which existed between Servilia and Cæsar, some have supposed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cas.—C. Nep. in Attic.

SERVILIA LEX de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the prætor, A. U. C. 653. It punished severely such as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not precisely known.—Another, de judicibus, by Q. Servilius Cæpio the consul, A. U. C. 648. It divided the right of judging between the senators and the equites, a privilege, which, though originally belonging to the senators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.—Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accused a Roman senator, so that he was condemned, the accuser should be honoured with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.—Another, Agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus, the tribune, A. U. C. 690. It required the immediate sale of certain houses and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchase of others in a different part of Italy. It required that ten commissioners should be appointed to see it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its passing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced against it.

SERVILIUS PUBLIUS, a consul who supported the cause of the people against the nobles, and obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senate, after defeating the Volsci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently opposed the people, because they had illiberally treated him.—Ahala, a master of horse to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refused to appear before the dictator to answer the accusations which were brought against him on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, Ahala slew him in the midst of the people, whose protection he claimed. Ahala was accused for this murder, and banished, but his sentence was afterwards repealed. He was raised to the dictatorship.—Publius, a proconsul of Asia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Isauria, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.—A Roman general who defeated an army of Etrurians.—Nonianus, a Latin historian who wrote an history of Rome in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another also illustrious for his genius and literary merit.—Casca, one of Cæsar's murderers.—The family of the Servilii was of patrician rank, and came to settle at Rome after the destruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the highest offices of the state. To the several branches of this family were attached the different surnames of Ahala, Avilla, Priscus, Cæpio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatia, Casca, Fidenas, Longus, and Tuca.

SERVIVS TULLIUS, the sixth king of

Rome, was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his slavery. [It is not known who his father was, and it was probably not till after his elevation to the royal dignity that he was represented as having been the son of a person of rank who was killed in defence of his country.] Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and, though originally a slave, he raised himself so much to consequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favours, and Servius, become the favourite of the people and the darling of the soldiers by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and as a legislator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census which told him that Rome contained about 84 thousand inhabitants. He increased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes, and, that he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on Mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin and the younger to Aruns. This union would, as might be supposed, tend to ensure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B. C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honour, in the temple of Diana on Mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia, his wife, buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 6.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—*Ovid. about a century B. C. He cultivated polite literature from a very early period, especially philosophy and poetry. At an early age he appeared as a pleader at the bar. In consequence of a reproof received from Quintus Mucius, an eminent lawyer, grounded upon his ignorance of the law, he applied himself with great industry to legal studies, and became one of the most eminent lawyers of Rome. Cicero highly commends his legal knowledge. Sulpitius passed through the various civil offices of the Roman state, and was consul B. C. 51. Cæsar made him governor of Achaia after the battle of Pharsalia, but when that chief was taken off, Sulpitius returned to Rome and acted with the republican party. He died in the camp of Antony under the walls of Modena, having been sent on an embassy to that leader from the Roman senate. Cicero, in his 9th Philippic, pleads for a brazen statue to be erected to Sulpitius, which honour was granted by the senate.]—Claudius, a grammarian. Suet. de cl. Gar.—Honoratus Maurus, a learned grammarian in the age of [Arcadius and Honorius.] He wrote Latin commentaries upon Virgil, still extant. [These are, however, considered rather as a collection of ancient remarks and criticisms on the poet than as composed by himself. They contain many valuable notices of the geography and arts of antiquity. These commentaries are found annexed to some of the older editions of Virgil. They are most correctly given in the edition of Virgil, by Burman. Amst. 1746, 4 vols. 4to.]

SESOSTRIS, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. [vid. the end of this article.] His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publicly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself surrounded by a number of faithful ministers and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red Sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated farther into the east than the conqueror of Darius. He also invaded Europe, and subdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia, Sesostris, the king of kings, has conquered this territory by his arms. At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis, to facilitate navigation, and the communication of one province with another. In his old age, Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself, after a reign of 44 years according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supported that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. [Historians are even divided as to the identity of the name of this monarch, with that of some other similar names in the Egyptian history; and several hold him to be the same with the Sesac or Shesac of the Hebrew Scriptures. From the recent discovery of M. Champollion, it would seem that Sesostris was the first king of the 19th dynasty of Manetho. Champollion reads his name in hieroglyphics as Ramses or Rameses, agreeing with what is stated by Tacitus, Am. 2, c. 60. Perizonius (Origin. Egypt. c. 17.) had previously contended for the identity of Sesostris and Rhamses.] Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diod. 1.—Val. Flacc. 5, v. 419.—Plin. 33, c. 3.—Lucan. 10, v. 276.—Strab. 16.

SETHON, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. [vid. the end of this article.] He was attacked by the Assyrians, and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow-strings and thongs, so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious. ["The Babylonian Talmud," observes Prideaux, "states that the destruction upon the army of the Assyrians was executed by lightning, and some of the Targums are quoted for saying the same thing; but it seems most likely that it was affected by bringing on them the hot wind which is frequent in those parts, and often when it lights among a multitude destroys great numbers of them in a moment, as frequently happens to caravans; and the words of Isaiah, that God would send a blast against Senacherib denote also the same thing. Herodotus gives us some kind of a disguised account of this deliverance from the Assyrians in a fabulous application of it to the city of Pelusium instead of Jerusalem, and to Setho the Egyptian instead of Hezekiah." The learned Dean then remarks upon the strong confirmation given to the account in Scripture by the statement of Herodotus, and his mentioning the very name of Senacherib.] Herodot. 2, c. 141.

SEVERA, Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady whom the emperor Heliogabalus married. She was soon after repudiated, though possessed of all the charms of mind and body which could captivate the most virtuous.—Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor, her husband, repudiated her, and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at last ensured her son Gratian on the imperial throne.—The wife of Philip the Roman emperor.

SEVERIÁNUS, a governor of Macedonia, father-in-law to the emperor Philip.—A general of the Roman armies in the reign of Valentinian, defeated by the Germans.—A son of the emperor Severus.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind, and a restless activity that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the licentiousness of the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the Barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire, Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didus and all his partisans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus himself was soon deserted by his favourites, and assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honours or titles the conqueror claimed. In professing that he had assumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the pretorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the east at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till, on the plains of Issus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner, all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the east, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power. He attempted to assassinate him by his emissaries; but when this had failed of success, Severus had recourse to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was so elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he insulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had suffered it to putrify before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by the dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus shared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richest of the citizens were sacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honours, and his murderers were punished in the most wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life he led in Rome, Severus marched into the east, with his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon success made himself master of Seleucia, Babylon, and Ctesiphon; and advanced without opposition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more southern provinces of Asia; after he had visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a senate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the most criticizing and inquisitive curiosity, the several monuments and ruins which that ancient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the east. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall across the northern parts of the island to defend it against the frequent invasions of the Caledonians. Hitherto successful against his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family disturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was so shocked at the undutifulness of his son, that on his return home he called him into his presence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn sword, adding, If you are so ambitious of reigning alone, now imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witnesses of your want of filial tenderness. If these words checked Caracalla, yet he did not show himself concerned, and Severus, worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneasiness of his mind increased, soon after died, exclaiming he had been every thing man could wish, but that he was then nothing. Some say that he wished to poison himself, but that when this was denied, he ate to great excess, and soon after expired at York on the fourth of February, in the 21th year of the Christian era, in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years 8 months and 3 days. Severus has been so much admired for his military talents, that some have called him the most warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been observed that he never did an act of humanity or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always showed himself an open enemy to pomp and splendour. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even composed an history of his own reign, which some have praised for its correctness and veracity. However cruel Severus may appear in his punishments and in his revenge, many have endeavoured to exculpate him, and observed that there was need of severity in an empire whose morals were so corrupted, and where no less than 3000 persons were accused of adultery during the space of 17 years. Of him, as of Augustus, some were fond to say, that it would have been better for the world if he had never been born, or had never died. Dio.—Herodian.—Victor.&c.—Alexander, (Marcus Aurelius,) a native of Phœnicia, adopted by Heliogabalus. His father's name was Genesis Marcianus, and his mother's Julia Mammæa, and he received the surname of Alexander because he was born in a temple sacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals, and the character of his preceptors, preserved him from those infirmities and that licentiousness which old age too often attributes to the depravity of youth. At the death of Heliogabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the universal shouts of the army and the congratulations of the senate. He had not long been on the throne before the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians. Alexander marched into the east without delay, and soon obtained a decisive victory over the Barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans soon after called him away from the indolence of the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with some success, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the stern and sullen strictness of the disciplinarian. His soldiers, fond of repose, murmured against his severity: their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midst of his camp, after a reign of 13 years and 9 days, on the 18th of March, A. D. 235. His mother Mamæa shared his fate with all his friends; but this was no sooner known than the soldiers punished with immediate death all such as had been concerned in the murder, except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every historian, except Herodian, is bold to assert, that if he had lived, the Roman empire might have been freed from those tumults and abuses which continually disturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and senators in perpetual alarms. His severity in punishing offences was great, and such as had robbed the public, were they even the most intimate friends of the emperor, were indiscriminately sacrificed to the tranquillity of the state which they had violated. The great offices of the state, which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favourites, were now bestowed upon merit, and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools, which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticoes. Alex. vit.—Herodian.—Zosim.—Victor.—Flavius Valerius, a native of Illyricum, nominated Cæsar by Galerius. SEXTIUS LUCIUS, was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus; he gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated l. od. 4, to him.—The first plebeian consul.—One of the sons of Tarquin. vid. Tarquinus.

SEXTUS, a prænomén given to the sixth son of a family.—A son of Pompey the Great. vid. Pompeius.—A Stoic philosopher, born at Cheronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus.—A philosopher in the age of Antoninus. He was one of the followers of the doctrines of Pyrrho. Some of his works are still extant.

SIBYLLE, certain women [supposed to be] inspired by heaven, who flourished in different parts of the world. [The name is supposed to be derived from σιος, an Æolic form for θεος, deus, and βουλη, consilium.] Their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of ten, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned. These ten Sibyls generally resided in the following places, Persia, Libya, Delhi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythræa, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessia on the Hellespont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtis. The most celebrated of the Sibyls was that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Pheonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that, to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigour, and bloom, of which she was then in possession. The god granted her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepid, her form decayed, melancholy paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and, as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand. She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual for the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up these leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin the Second, with nine volumes, which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; [vid. Duumviri.] and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses, which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration; and, to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of these Sibylline verses, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. [The emperor Honorius issued an order, A. D. 399, for destroying them; in pursuance of which, Stilicho burnt all these prophetic writings, and demolished the temple of Apollo in which they had been deposited. Nevertheless, there are still preserved, in eight books of Greek verse, a collection of oracles, pretended to be Sibylline. Dr. Cave, who is well satisfied that this collection is a forgery, supposes that a large part of it was composed in the time of Adrian, about A. D. 130; that other parts were added in the time of the Antonines, and the whole completed in the reign of Commodus. Dr. Prideaux says that this collection must have been made between A. D. 138 and 167. Some of the Christian fathers, not apprized of the imposition, have often cited the books of the Sibyls in favour of the Christian religion; and hence Celsus takes occasion to call the Christians Sibyllists. Dr. Lardner states his conviction that the Sibylline oracles quoted by St. Clement and other of the Greek fathers, are the forgeries of some Christian. Bishop Horsely has ably supported the opinion, however, that the Sibylline books contained records of prophecies vouchsafed to nations extraneous to the patriarchal families and the Jewish commonwealth, before the general defection to idolatry. Although the books were at last interpolated, yet, according to the views taken of the subject by the learned bishop, this was too late to throw discredit on the confident appeal made to them by Justin.] *Plut. in Phad.—Ælian. SICAMBRI, or SYGAMBRI, a people of Germany, conquered by the Romans, [originally occupying what is now Guelderland.] They revolted against Augustus, who marched against them, but did not totally reduce them. Drusus conquered them. [Being pressed by the Catti, whom Cæsar calls Suevi, they were, together with the Ubii, received into Gaul, on the left bank of the Rhine, under Augustus; and there is reason to believe that the people who occupied this position under the name of Gugerni were Sicambrians.] Diog. 54.—Strab. 4.—Horat. 4.—Od. 2, v. 36.—Od. 14, v. 51.—Tacit. 2, Ann. 26.

SICĀNI, [an ancient nation of Sicily. They appear to have been of Iberian, and not of Spanish origin as is generally thought, and to have come originally from Upper Asia. They first descended into Italy, and took possession of that district afterwards known by the name of Riviera di Genoa, whence in process of time they spread themselves over Etruria, Latium, and Campania. From the river Sicanius they took the name of Sicani, and when driven towards the south by the Ligurians, proceeded as far as Rhegium, crossed the strait of Messina, and after a contest with the Siculi, already established on the eastern part of Sicily, they finally settled on the western coast of that delightful island. Edinburgh Review, No. 80, p. 331.]—*Dionys. SICCA, a town of Numidia, [south-west of Carthage, near the river Bagradas. It received the appellation of Veneria from a temple of Venus which it contained. Its ruins are visible at a place called Keff.] Sal. in Jug. 56.

SICĒLIS, (SICĒLIDES, plur.) an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muses are called Sicelides by Virgil, because Theocritus was a native of Sicily, whom the Latin poet, as a writer of Bucolic poetry, professed to imitate. Virg. Ec. 4.

SICHÆUS, called also Sicharbas and Aherbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Plisthenes. He married Elisa, the daughter of Belus, and sister of king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was so extremely rich, that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his possessions. This murder Pygmalion concealed from his sister Dido; and he amused her by telling her that her husband was gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would soon return. This would have perhaps succeeded had not the shade of Sicæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and advised her to fly from Tyre, after she had previously secured some treasures, which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obscure and unknown place. According to Justin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Patere. 1, c. 6.—Justin. 18, c. 4.

SICĪLIA, the largest and most celebrated island in the Mediterranean Sea, at the bottom of Italy. It was anciently called Sicania, [from the Sicani,] Trinacria, [from its three promontories, τρεῖς ἀκρεῖς,] and Triquetra, [from its triangular shape. Its name Sicilia was derived from the Siculi. vid. Siculi.] It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum, looking towards Greece; and Pelorum, towards Italy. [Sicily is about 170 British miles in length and 70 in medial breadth. Swinburne reckons its greatest length at 210 miles, and its breadth at 133. Its area contains 12,600 square miles.] This island was celebrated for its fertility, so much that it was called one of the granaries of Rome, and Pliny says that it rewarded the husbandmen an hundred fold. Its most famous cities were Syracuse, Messina, Leontini, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The highest and most famous mountain in the island is Ætna, whose frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants; from which circumstance the ancients supposed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this island, and after them it came into the possession of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at last of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. [vid. however, Sicani, and Siculi.] The plains of Enna are well known for their excellent honey, and, according to Diodorus, the hounds lost their scent in hunting, on account of the many odoriferous plants that profusely perfumed the air. Ceres and Proserpine were the chief deities of the place, and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks settled some colonies here, and at last the Carthaginians became masters of the whole island, till they were dispossessed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors suppose that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was separated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the straits of Charybdis were formed. The inhabitants of Sicily were so fond of luxury, that Sicula mensæ became proverbial. The rights of citizens of Rome were extended to them by M. Antony. Cic. 14.—Att. 12.—Verr. 2, c. 13.—Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Justin. 4, c. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 414, &c.—Ital. 14, v. 11, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 8, &c.—The island of Naxos, in the Ægean, was called Little Sicily on account of its fruitfulness.

L. SICINIUS DENTĀTUS, a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valour and the honours he obtained in the field of battle during the period of 40 years in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was present in 121 battles; he obtained 14 civic crowns; 3 mural crowns; 3 crowns of gold; 83 golden collars; 60 bracelets; 18 lances; 23 horses with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon services. He could show the scars of 45 wounds which he had received, all in his breast, particularly in opposing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicinius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wished to make himself absolute at Rome, and therefore, to remove him from the capital, he sent him to the army, by which, soon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicinius killed 15 and wounded 30; and, according to Dionysius, the surviving number had recourse to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a shower of stones and darts thrown at a distance, about 405 years before the Christian era. For his uncommon courage Sicinius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Dionys. 8.—Vellutus was one of the first tribunes in Rome. He raised cabals against Coriolanus, and was one of his accusers. Plut. in Cor.—Sabinus, a Roman general who defeated the Volsci.

SICŌRUS, now Segre, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and falling into the Iberus a little above its mouth. It was near this river that J. Cæsar conquered Afranius and Petreius, the partizans of Pompey. [vid. Iberda.]

SICŪLI, [an Illyrian race, from the frontiers of Dalmatia. They first settled in central Italy, in what was subsequently called Latium, but being afterwards driven to the extremity of the peninsula, they crossed over into Sicily, and gave name to that island, colonizing a part of it. They gave their name to the island. This, as some suppose, happened about 300 years before Greek colonies settled in the island, or about 1059 years before the Christian era. Diod. 5.—Dionys. Pal.—Strab.

SICŪLUM FRETUM, [now the Straits of Faro or Messina,] the sea which separates Sicily from Italy is 15 miles long, but in some places so narrow that the barking of dogs can be heard from shore to shore. [Opposite Messina, the distance across is only three miles.] This strait is supposed to have been formed by an earthquake, which separated the island from the continent. Plin. 3, c. 8.

SICYON, now Basilico, a town of Peloponnesus, the capital of Sicyonia. It is celebrated as being the most ancient kingdom of Greece, under a succession of monarchs, of whom little is known except the names. Ægialeus was the first king. [From Ægialeus it took its original name of Ægialæ. This was afterwards changed to Apia, from the name of its fourth king, Apis, and, in process of time, the name was again altered to Sicyon, from its 19th king. He reigned about 740 years after its supposed foundation of the city, and from this time, according to some, not only the kingdom, but the whole Peloponnesus, was called Sicyonia, until the period of the dissolution of the former. If we follow the computation which some have made from Eusebius, this kingdom was founded B. C. 2089, and it would then be among the oldest in the world. Other chronologers, however, have corrected this evident mistake, and have made the commencement of the reign of Ægialeus much later.] Some ages after, Agamemnon made himself master of the place, and afterwards it fell into the hands of the Heraclidæ. It became very powerful in the time of the Achaean league, which it joined B. C. 251, at the persuasion of Aratus. The inhabitants of Sicyon are mentioned by some authors as dissolute, and fond of luxury; hence the Sicyonian shoes, which were once very celebrated, are deemed marks of effeminacy. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Lucret. 1, v. 1118.—Liv. 2, c. 19, l. 33, c. 15.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Dem.—Paus. 2, c. 1, &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54.—Virg. G. 2, v. 519.

SICYONIA, a province of Peloponnesus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. It was the most eminent kingdom of Greece, and in its flourishing situation not only its dependent states, but also the whole Peloponnesus was called Sicyonia. The territory was said to abound with corn, wine, and olives, and also with iron mines. It produced many celebrated men, particularly artists. vid. Sicyon.

SIDE, a town of Pamphylia. Liv. 37, c. 23.—Cic. 3, fam. 6.

SIDICĪNUM, a town of Campania, called also Teanum. [vid. Teanum.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

SIDON, [in Scripture Tzidon, the oldest and most powerful city of Phœnicia, five geographical miles north of Tyrus, on the sea-coast; it is now Sayda. Sidon was famed for its extensive commerce, and was for a long time the metropolis of Phœnicia, until Tyre became more powerful and reduced Sidon for a time beneath its sway. Moses informs us that this city was built by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, the father and founder of the Phœnicians. Justin, however, refers the name to Sindon, which, in the Phœnician language, signifies a fish. From Joshua we learn that Sidon was rich and powerful when the Israelites took possession of Canaan; and St. Jerome states that it fell to the lot of the tribe of Asher. In the year 1015 Sidon was dependent on Tyre, but in 720 it shook off the yoke and surrendered to Salmanazar when he entered Phœnicia. When the Persians became masters of this city in the reign of Cyrus, they permitted the Sidonians to have kings of their own. Sidon was ruined in the year 351 B. C. by Ochus, king of Persia. When the inhabitants saw the enemy in the city, they shut themselves up in their houses with their wives and children, and perished in the flames of the place. According to Diodorus Siculus, those Sidonians who were absent from the city at the time, returned and rebuilt it after the Persian forces were withdrawn. Sidon afterwards passed into the hands of the Macedonians, and lastly into those of the Romans.] The people of Sidon are well known for their industry, their skill in arithmetic, in astronomy, and commercial affairs, and in sea-voyages. They, however, have the character of being very dishonest. Their women were peculiarly happy in working embroidery. The invention of glass, of linen, and of a beautiful purple dye, is attributed to them. Lucan. 3, v. 217, l. 10, v. 141.—Diod. 16.—Justin. 11, c. 10.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—*Homer. SIDŌNIS, is the country of which Sidon was the capital, situate at the west of Syria, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 19.—Dido, as a native of the country, is often called Sidonis. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 30.

SIDONIUS CAIUS SOLLIUS APOLLINARIS, a Christian writer, born A. D. 430. He died in the 52d year of his age. There are remaining of his compositions some letters, and different poems, consisting chiefly of panegyrics on the great men of his time, written in heroic verse, and occasionally in other metre, of which the best edition is that of Labbæus, Paris, 4to. 1652.—The epithet of Sidonius is applied not only to the natives of Sidon, but it is used to express the excellence of any thing, especially embroidery or dyed garments. Carthage is called Sidonia urbs, because built by Sidonians. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 682.

SIGA, [a city in the western part of Numidia, or what was afterwards Mauretania Cæsariensis. It was situate at some distance from the sea, and was the residence of Sypfax before the invasion of Masinissa's kingdom had put him in possession of Cirta. It is now Ned-Roma.] Plin. 5, c. 11.

SIGÆUM, or SIGËUM, now Cape Ieneihisari, where the Scamander falls into the sea. It was near Sigæum that the greatest part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. [Patroclus and Antilochus were also buried on this promontory, and three large tumuli, or mounds of earth, are supposed to mark at the present day the three tombs. According to a passage in Homer, however, (Od. Ω , 75-77,) it would seem that one tomb covered the ashes of all three. The reader may see a learned and full discussion of this and every other difficulty relative to the scene of the Trojan war, in "Hobhouse's Journey," vol. 2, p. 128, &c. and "Clarke's Travels in Greece," &c. vol. 1, p. 36, &c.—On the sloping side of the promontory was built in a period of remote antiquity the town of Sigæum. It was reported to have been built by Archæanax of Mitylene out of the ruins of ancient Troy. After a variety of fortunes it was destroyed by the inhabitants of New Ilium, and was a ruin in the time of Strabo.] Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312, l. 7, v. 294.—*Ovid. SILA, or ZYLA, a large wood in the country of the Brutii near the Appenines, abounding with much pitch. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 715.

D. SILANUS, a son of T. Manlius Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his son guilty of extortion and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv. 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 5, c. 8.—C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Cythera. Tacit.—A proprætor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there while Annibal was in Italy.—Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus against Jugurtha. He was accused by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges.—Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero.—Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials Silanus killed himself.—An augur in the army of the 10,000 Greeks at their return from Cunaxa.

SILARUS, [a river of Italy separating Lucania from the territory of the Picentini. Its banks were much infested by the gad fly. It is now the Silaro.] Its waters, as it is reported, petrified all leaves that fell into them. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 146.—Plin. 2, c. 103.—Silv. 2, v. 582.

SILENUS, a demi-god, who became the nurse, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. [vid. the end of this article.] He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Lesbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by some peasants in Phrygia, after he had lost his way, and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. [According to another account, Midas mixed wine with the waters of a fountain to which Silenus was accustomed to come, and so inebriated and caught him.] He detained him for ten days, and afterwards restored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors assert that Silenus was a philosopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and assisted him by the soundness of his counsels. From this circumstance, therefore, he is often introduced speaking with all the gravity of a philosopher concerning the formation of the world and the nature of things. [The best ancient writers favour this latter opinion, and make Silenus to have been a profound philosopher, whose wisdom was equal to his knowledge. The drunkenness, of which mention is so often made, was, according to them, merely mystical, and signified that he was profoundly engaged in speculation. The fable of his riding on an ass is explained by supposing that he made slow but sure advances in philosophy ; and the asses ears, which he is sometimes represented as wearing, indicate, according to Tertullian, his great intelligence. Vossius explains the fable of the fountain of wine, by saying that it signified only the great desire Midas had to get Silenus into his possession, and to converse with him, on account of the fame of his extraordinary talents. Silenus is represented also as having been distinguished for his skill in music.] The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs, are often called Sileni. Paus. 3, c. 25, l. 6, c. 24.—Philost. 23.—*Ovid. SILICIS MONS, a town near Padua.

SILIS, a river of Venetia in Italy, falling into the Adriatic. Plin. 3, c. 18.

C. SILIUS ITALICUS, a Latin poet [born about the 15th year of the Christian era. He has been supposed to have been a native of Italica in Spain, but his not being claimed as a fellow-countryman by Martial, who has bestowed upon him the highest praises, renders this improbable. Some make him to have been a native of Corfinium, a city of the Peligni in Italy, which, according to Strabo, was called Italica in the time of the Social war; but Velleius Paterculus informs us that Corfinium merely intended to change its name to Italica, and that the project was never carried into effect. Whether, however, he were a native of Italica in Spain, or of an Italica elsewhere, his surname certainly does not show it, for in that event it would have been Italicensis. It is most probable that Italicus was a family name; and it may have been given to one of his ancestors when residing in some province to show that he was of Italian origin.] He was originally at the bar, where he for some time distinguished himself, till he retired from Rome more particularly to consecrate his time to study. He was consul the year that Nero was murdered. [He afterwards made a discreet and humane use of the friendship of Vitellius, and having acquired much honour from his conduct in the proconsulship of Asia, he thenceforth withdrew from public life to literary retirement.] Pliny has observed, that when Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Silius refused to come to Rome and congratulate him like the rest of his fellow-citizens, a neglect which was never represented by the emperor, or insolently mentioned by the poet. Silius was in possession of Cicero's villa at Tusculum, and Virgil's near Naples, where that poet was interred; and it has been justly remarked, that he looked upon no temple with greater reverence than upon the sepulchre of the immortal poet, whose steps he followed, but whose fame he could not equal. The birth-day of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unusual pomp and solemnity by Silius; and for his partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compositions, of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius starved himself when labouring under an imposthume, which his physicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus on the second Punic war, divided into 17 books, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been so favourable concerning its merit. The poetry is weak and inelegant, yet the author deserves to be commended for his purity, the authenticity of his narrations, and his interesting descriptions. He has every where imitated Virgil, but with little success. [Pliny says that he wrote with more diligence than genius, and every reader of his poetry will coincide in this opinion. His plan also is defective, in his selecting an historical mode of treating his subject. Had he transported his readers in the very outset to the latter years of the war, he might have taken for his theme Annibal's attempt to make himself master of Rome, and produced a far more spirited and interesting production. He errs also in blending mythological fictitious with real narratives, which gives a strange and varied aspect to his poem. His imitations of preceding poets are very apparent. Not only Virgil, but Lucretius, Horace, Homer, and Hesiod, have been compelled to contribute their stores, a circumstance which gives rise to a disagreeable inequality. Like Valerius Flaccus he hides his inferiority under a display of erudition, and, by an affected and pompous manner, diffuses a frigid air over his poem.] Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His son was honoured with the consulship during his lifetime. The best editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to. Uta. 1717, that of Cellarius, 8vo. Lips. 1695, [that of Villebrune, 1782, 4 vols. 12mo. but, above all, that of Ruperti, Goetting. 1795, 2 vols. 8vo.] Mart. 11, ep. 49, &c.—Caius, a man of consular dignity greatly loved by Messalina for his comely appearance and elegant address. Messalina obliged him to divorce his wife that she might enjoy his company without intermission. Silius was forced to comply, though with great reluctance, and he was at last put to death for the adulteries which the empress obliged him to commit. Tacit. Suet.—Dio.

SILPHIUM, a part of Libya.

SILVANUS, a rural deity, son of an Italian shepherd by a goat. From this circumstance he is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was son of Picus, or, as others report, of Mars, or, according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tusculanaria, a young woman, who introduced herself into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worship of Silvanus was established only in Italy, where, as some authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand, because he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cyparissus, who was changed into a tree of the same name. Silvanus presided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. *Plut. in Parall.—Virg. Ecl. 10, G. 1, v. 20, l. 2, v. 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, c. 42.—Ovid. SILURES, the people of South Wales in Britain, [occupying the counties of Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecon, and Glamorgan. Their capital was Isca Silurum, now Caerleon, on the river Isca or Uske, in Glamorganshire. Caractacus was a prince of the Silures.]

SIMBRIVIVUS, or SIMBRUVIVUS, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit. 14, Ann. 22.

SIMETHUS, or SYMETHUS, a town and river at the east of Sicily, which served as a boundary between the territories of the people of Catania and the Leontini. [It is now the Giaretta. The nymph Thalia, after her amour with Jupiter, is supposed to have been converted into this stream, which, to avoid the rage of Juno, sunk under ground near Mount Ætna, and continued this subterraneous course to the sea. In the time of the Romans, however, it was a navigable stream: nor does it now sink under ground, but throws up near its mouth great quantities of amber.] Virg. Æn. 9, v. 584.

SIMMIAS, a philosopher of Thebes who wrote dialogues.—A grammarian of Rhodes.

SIMOIS, (entis), a river of Troas, which rises in Mount Ida and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer and most of the ancient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. [Mr. Hobhouse appears to think that the modern Thymbrek may be the ancient Simois. The confluence of the Simois and Scamander has very little chance of being ascertained at the present day: its discovery would be of the utmost importance in determining the site of ancient Troy, since that city stood a very little distance above the confluence of the two rivers.] Homer. Il.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 104, l. 3, v. 302, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 324.—Mela, 1, c. 18.

SIMON, a courier of Athens, whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master concerning virtue, justice, poetry, music, honour, &c. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog. 2, c. 14.—Another who wrote on rhetoric. Id.

SIMÓNIDES, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B. C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems, one on Cambyses, king of Persia, &c. [He excelled, however, in elegiac composition, for which he was almost proverbially famous in antiquity. One of his most famous compositions was entitled "The Lamentations," of which a beautiful fragment is still extant. Simonides was endowed with a most extraordinary memory, and some have attributed to him the invention of the art of recollecting by localizing ideas.] Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily. He obtained a poetical prize in the 30th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. [He became very avaricious and mercenary towards the close of his life, and it is mentioned as a subject of dispraise, that he was the first who wrote verses for money. It was Simonides who gave that famous answer to Hiero, when the latter asked him respecting the nature of God. The poet desired a day to consider the question, then another, and at last many in succession. The monarch desiring to know the reason of this proceeding, he replied that the longer he reflected on the question the more difficult it appeared to be.] The people of Syracuse, who had hospitably honoured him when alive, erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters $\zeta, \theta, \phi, \chi$, to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet was also called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of invention, genealogies, &c. *Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Phædr. 4, fab. 21 and 24.—Horat. 2, Od. 1, v. 38.—Herodot. 5, c. 102.—Cic. de Orat. &c.—Arist.—Pindar. SIMPLICIUS, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

SINÆ, a people of India, called by Ptolemy the most eastern nation of the world. [The Sinæ of India, who dwelt beyond the river Serus or Menan, are supposed to have occupied what is now Cochin China.—There was another nation of the same name, east of Serica, who were probably settled in Shensi, the most westerly province of China, immediately adjoining the great wall. In this province was a kingdom called Tsin, which probably gave name to these Sinæ.]

SINDE, islands in the Indian Ocean, supposed to be the Nicabar islands.

SINGÆI, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

SINGARA, a city of Mesopotamia, now Singar, [south-east of Nisibis, on the river Mygdonius.]

SINGUS, [a town of Macedonia, on the promontory of Sithonia, giving name to the Sinus Singiticus or Gulf of Monte Santo.]

SINON, a son of Sisyphus who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers, to render the wind favourable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses, he had fled away from their camp not to be cruelly immolated. These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed and Sinon in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the side of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks who surprised the Trojans and pillaged their city. *Dares Phryg.—Homer. SINOPE, a daughter of the Asopus by Me throne. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the borders of the Euxine Sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus. Diod. 4.—A seaport town of Asia Minor, [on the eastern coast of Paphlagonia, now Sinub, at the mouth of the river Sinope. The antiquity of this place is traced to the time when the Cimmerians established themselves here, on being driven from their country by the Scythians. It was a feeble place, however, until a colony of Milesians came to it, when it became so powerful in a short time as to send out colonies of its own.] It was long an independent state, till Pharnaces, king of Pontus, seized it. It was the capital of Pontus under Mithridates, and was the birth-place of Diogenes, the Cynic philosopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo married there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67.—Strab. 2, &c. 12.—Diod. 4.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—The original name of Sinuessa.

SINTIÆ, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. [The Lemnians are called Sintii, according to Damm, from σινθησι, to injure, because they were reputed to have been the inventors of missile weapons, or else because they were addicted to piracy.] Homer. Il. 1, v. 594.

SINUËSSA, a maritime town of Campania, [south of Minturnæ and the mouth of the Liris. It derived its name, according to Strabo, from the sinuosity of the coast, which at this place formed a small gulf.] It was celebrated for its hot baths and mineral waters, which cured people of insanity, and rendered women prolific. *Ovid. SION, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built. [vid. Jerusalem.]

SIPHNOS, now Sifanto, one of the Cyclades, situate at the west of Paros, twenty miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or, according to modern travellers, forty. Siphnos had many excellent harbours, and produced great plenty of delicious fruit. [It was famed also for its pure and wholesome air, and the consequent longevity of its inhabitants. This island was reckoned one of the richest in the Archipelago, on account of the gold and silver mines which had been there discovered, and which paid a tenth to the temple of Apollo at Delphi. The effect of these riches was to render the inhabitants of this island corrupt and depraved in the extreme, and to make their name proverbial throughout all Greece for bad faith and licentiousness. The treasures concealed within the bosom of the island are at present unknown, the discovery of them is reserved no doubt for the time when Greece shall be completely freed from the burden of the Turkish yoke.] Paus. 10, c. 11.—Herodot. 3, c. 46.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

SIPYLUM and SIPYLUS, a town of Lydia, with a mountain of the same name near the Meander, formerly called Ceraunius. The town was destroyed by an earthquake with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. *Strab. 1 and 12.—Paus. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Homer. Il. 24.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. SIRBO. [vid. Serbonis Palus.]

SIRËNES, sea-nymphs who charmed so much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to listen with more attention, and at last died for want of food. [vid. end of this article.] They were daughters of the Achelous by the muse Calliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpsichore. They were three in number, called Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, or, according to others, Molpe, Aglaophonos, and Thelxiope, or Thelxione, and they usually lived in a small island near Cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors suppose that they were monsters, who had the form of a woman above the waist and the rest of the body like that of a bird; or rather that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the shape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monstrous form they had received from Ceres, who wished to punish them, because they had not assisted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But, according to Ovid, they were so disconsolate at the rape of Proserpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might seek her in the sea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their songs they should perish; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all passengers, till Ulysses, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, and no attention to be paid to his commands should he wish to stay and listen to the song. This was a salutary precaution. Ulysses made signs for his companions to stop, but they were disregarded, and the fatal coast was passed with safety. Upon this artifice of Ulysses, the Sirens were so disappointed that they threw themselves into the sea and perished. Some authors say, that the Sirens challenged the Muses to a trial of skill in singing, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adversaries, with which they made themselves crowns. The place where the Sirens destroyed themselves was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coast of Sicily. Virgil, however, Æn. 5, v. 364, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coast of Italy, near the island of Caprea. Some suppose that the Sirens were a number of lascivious women in Sicily, who prostituted themselves to strangers, and made them forget their pursuits while drowned in unlawful pleasures. [The etymology of Bochart, who deduces the name from a Phœnician term denoting a songstress, favours the explanation given of this fable by Damm. This distinguished critic makes the Sirens to have been excellent singers, and divesting the fables respecting them of all their terrific features, he supposes that by the charms of music and song they detained travellers, and made them altogether forgetful of their native land.] The Sirens are often represented holding, one a lyre, a second a flute, and the third singing. Paus. 10, c. 6.—*Homer. SIRENŪSÆ, three small rocky islands near the coast of Campania, where the Sirens were supposed to reside.

SIRIUS, or CANICŪLA, the dog star, whose appearance, as the ancients supposed, always caused great heat on the earth. [vid. Canicula.] Verg. Æn. 3, v. 141.

SIRMIO, now Sermione, a beautiful peninsula in the lake Benacus, where Catullus had a villa. Carm. 29.

SIRMIUM, the capital of Pannonia at the confluence of the Savus and Bacuntius [or

Save and Bozzeut,] very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors. [The adjacent district is still called Sirmia.]

SISAMNES, a judge flayed alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyses. His skin was nailed on the bench of the other judges to incite them to act with candour and impartiality. Herodot. 5, c. 25.

SISĀPO, a town of Spain, famous for its mines. [It is thought to answer to the modern Almaden in La Mancha. A great quantity of quicksilver is obtained from the mines at this place, even at the present day. The Sisapone of Ptolemy, (probably the same with the Cissalone of Antoninns,) was a different place, and lay more to the north-west of the former, among the Oretani.] Plin. 33, c. 7.—Cic. Phil. 2, c. 19.

L. SISENNA, an ancient historian among the Romans, 91 B. C. He wrote an account of the republic, [from the taking of Rome by the Gauls to the wars of Sylla,] of which Cicero speaks with great warmth, and also translated from the Greek the Milesian fables of Aristides. Some fragments of his compositions are quoted by different authors. *Ovid. SISIGAMBIS, or SISYGAMBIS, the mother of Darius the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favourites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and indeed, she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen with less concern the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost in one day, her husband and 80 of her brothers, whom Ochus had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, c. 9, l. 10, c. 5.

SISIMITHRÆ, a fortified place of Bactriana, 15 stadia high, 80 in circumference, and plain at the top. Alexander married Roxana there. Strab. 11.

SISOCOSTUS, one of the friends of Alexander, entrusted with the care of the rock Aornos. Curt. 8, c. 11.

SISŪPHUS, a brother of Athamas and Salmoneus, son of Æolus and Enaretta, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope the daughter of Atlas, or, according to others, of Pandareus, by whom he had several children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he debauched Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, because he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had suffered from the malevolence of Salmeoneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus says, destroyed the two sons whom she had by her uncle. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolyceus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friends, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls which by the mark he knew to be his own. The artifice of Sisyphus was so pleasing to Autolyceus, who had now found one more cunning than himself, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining death in his palace, and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion, however, is, that Sisyphus, on his death-bed, intreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received the permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions than he violated his engagements, and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity and honour, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients. Homer. Od. v. 592.—Virg. Æn. 6. v. 616.—*Ovid. SMARAGDUS, a mountain of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (smaragdi) were dug. [The Smaragdus Mons appears to have been a very short distance from the sea; being that called by the Arabs Maaden Uzzumurud, or the Mine of Emeralds.] Strab. 16.

SMERDIS, a son of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyses. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Persia, who was himself called Smerdis, and who greatly resembled the deceased prince, declared himself king at the death of Cambyses. This usurpation would not perhaps have been known had not he taken too many precautions to conceal it. [Otanes, a Persian noble of the first rank, suspecting at last that there was some imposture, from the circumstance of Smerdis never quitting the citadel, and from his never inviting any of the nobility to his presence, discovered the whole affair through his daughter Phædyma. This female had been the wife of Cambyses, and with the other wives of the late king, had been retained by the usurper. At her father's request she felt the head of Smerdis while he slept, and discovered that he had no ears. Otanes on this was fully convinced that the pretended monarch was no other than the Magus Smerdis, he having been deprived of his ears by Cyrus on account of some atrocious conduct. Upon this discovery the conspiracy ensued which ended with the death of Smerdis, and the elevation of Darius, son of Hystaspes, to the vacant throne. The discovery of this imposture was long celebrated in Persia as a festival: by reason of the great slaughter of the Magi, which was made when Smerdis was put to death, it was called by a Persian name which the Greeks render by Magophonia. Some suppose that the name of Magi was given them after this event, from a Persian word signifying cropt-eared. *vid. SMINTHEUS, one of the surnames of Apollo. [He was worshipped under this name in the city of Chrysa, in Troas, where he also had a temple.] The inhabitants raised him this temple, because he had destroyed a number of rats that infested the country. These rats were called σμινθαί, in the language of Phrygia, whence the surname. There is another story similar to this relat.

ed by the Greek scholiast of Homer. Il. 1, v. 3. [Strabo gives a different account of the origin of the temple from the old poet Calinos. According to him, the Teuceri, migrating from Crete, were told by an oracle to settle in that place where they should first be attacked by the original inhabitants of the land. Having halted for the night in this place, a large number of field-mice came and gnawed away the leathern straps of their baggage and thongs of their armour. Deeming the oracle fulfilled, they settled on the spot, and raised a temple to Apollo Smintheus. The town of Chrysa is sometimes called Sminthium. vid. Chrysa.]—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 585.

SMYRNA, a celebrated sea-port town of Ionia in Asia Minor, built, as some suppose, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. [The latter is the more correct opinion. The Æolian colony which founded Smyrna is said to have come from Cumæ. The city took the name of Smyrna from the wife of the leader of the colony: it belonged therefore originally to the Æolian league. A party of Colophonian exiles, however, having been received into the city, requited the hospitality of the inhabitants by shutting the gates upon them while they were without the walls celebrating a festival, and so made themselves masters of the place. They were besieged by the Æolians, but to no purpose; and at last it was agreed that they should remain in possession of the place upon delivering up to the former inhabitants their private property. Smyrna after this was strengthened by an Ephesian colony, and became a member of the Ionian confederacy. It was subsequently taken and destroyed by Sardyattes, king of Lydia, and the inhabitants were scattered among the adjacent villages. They lived thus for the space of 400 years, until Antigonus, one of Alexander's generals, charmed with the situation, founded, about 20 stadia from the site of the old, a new city called Smyrna, on the southern shore of the gulf. Lysimachus completed what Antigonus had begun, and the new city became one of the most beautiful in Lower Asia. Another account makes Alexander, the founder of this city, and Pliny and Pausanias both adopt this opinion; but it is contradicted by the simple fact, that Alexander in his expedition against Darius, never came to this spot, but passed on rapidly from Sardis to Ephesus.] The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were universally esteemed for their valour and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been destroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the Christian era. Smyrna still continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believe that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion, they not only paid him divine honours, but showed a place which bore the poet's name, and also had a brass coin in circulation, which was called Homerium. SOCRATES, the most celebrated philosopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniscus was a statuary, and his mother Phenarete was by profession a midwife. [Upon the death of his father, he was left with no other inheritance than the small sum of eighty minæ, which, through the dishonesty of a relation to whom Sophroniscus left the charge of his affairs, he soon lost. This laid him under the necessity of supporting himself by labour; and he continued to practice for some time the possession of his father in Athens; at the same time, however, devoting all the leisure he could command to the study of philosophy. He is said to have formed statues of the habited graces, which were allowed a place in the citadel of Athens.] He was called away from this meaner employment, of which, however, he never blushed, by Crito, who admired his genius and courted his friendship. Philosophy soon became the study of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which succeeding ages have ever loved and venerated. [Prodicus the sophist, was his preceptor in eloquence, Evenus in poetry, Theodorus in geometry, and Damo in Music. Aspasia, a woman no less celebrated for her intellectual than her personal accomplishments, whose house was frequented by the most celebrated characters, had also some share in the education of Socrates.] He appeared like the rest of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldness and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and disciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preservation of their lives. But the character of Socrates appears more conspicuous as a philosopher and moralist than as that of a warrior. He was fond of labour, he inured himself to suffer hardships, and he acquired that serenity of mind and firmness of countenance which the most alarming dangers could never destroy, or the most sudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity, or the wish of appearing singular. He bore injuries with patience, and the insults of malice or resentment he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expressed some concern, and felt compassion for the depravity of human nature. So single and so venerable a character was admired by the most enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the good of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the accumulation of riches, was the object of his study, he was present every where, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyssus. He spoke with freedom on every subject, religious as well as civil, and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withstand the torrent of resentment by which the Athenian generals were capitally punished for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusæ. [He was at this time one of the senate of five hundred, and was president of the day when the matter came first under consideration.] This independence of spirit, and that visible superiority of mind and genius over the rest of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates: but as his character was irreproachable, and his doctrines pure and void of all obscurity, the voice of malevolence was silent. Yet Aristophanes soon undertook, in his comedy of the Clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the stage. [vid. remarks under the article Aristophanes.] It seems that Socrates, who seldom visited the theatre except when the tragedies of Euripides were performed, attended the representation of this play at a time when the house was crowded with strangers, who happened to be at Athens during the celebration of a Bacchanalian festival. When the performer who represented Socrates, appeared upon the stage, a general whisper passed along the benches where the strangers sat, to enquire who the person was whom the poet meant to satirize. Socrates, who had taken his station in one of the most public parts of the theatre, observed this circumstance, and immediately with great coolness, rose up to gratify the curiosity of the audience, and remained standing during the rest of the representation. One of the spectators, astonished at the magnanimity which this action discovered, asked him whether he did not feel himself much chagrined to be thus held up to public derision. "By no means," replied Socrates; "I am only a host at a public festival, where I provide a large company with entertainment." The confidence which Socrates discovered in his own innocence and merit, and the uniform consistency and dignity of his conduct, screened him for the present from the assaults of envy and malice. When Aristophanes attempted the following year to renew the piece with alterations and additions, the representation was so much discouraged that he was forced to discontinue it.] A second and more successful attempt to injure the philosopher was made some years after by an open prosecution. Melitus stood forth to criminate him, together with Anitus and Lycon, and the philosopher was summoned before the tribunal of the five hundred. He was accused of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods which the Athenians worshipped; yet false as this might appear, the accusers relied for the success of their cause upon the perjury of false witnesses, and the envy of the judges, whose ignorance would readily yield to misrepresentation, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice. In this their expectations were not frustrated, and while the judges expected submission from Socrates, and that meanness of behaviour and servility of defence which distinguished criminals, the philosopher, perhaps, accelerated his own fall by the firmness of his mind and his uncomplying integrity. Lysias, one of the most celebrated orators of the age, composed an oration in a laboured and pathetic style, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the presence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praised the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expressive of fortitude, and, comparing it to Sicyonian shoes, which, though fitting, were proofs of effeminacy, he observed, that a philosopher ought to be conspicuous for magnanimity and for firmness of soul. In his apology he spoke with great animation, and confessed that while others boasted that they were acquainted with every thing, he himself knew nothing. The whole discourse was full of simplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modestly said, that what he possessed was applied for the service of the Athenians: it was his wish to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty he performed by the special command of the gods, whose authority, said he emphatically to his judges, I regard more than yours. Such language from a man who was accused of a capital crime, astonished and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the spirit of the Athenian laws, to pass sentence on himself, and to mention the death he preferred, the philosopher said, For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth justice and moderation, and to render the rest of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expense the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honour, O Athenians, which I deserve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen happy in appearance, but I have made you so in reality. This exasperated the judges in the highest degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addressed the court, and more particularly the judges, who had decided in his favour, in a pathetic speech. He told them that to die was a pleasure, since he was going to hold converse with the greatest heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceless children, and as he returned to the prison, he exclaimed: I go to die, you to live; but which is the best the Divinity alone can know. The solemn celebration of the Delian festivals [vid. Delia.] prevented his execution for thirty days, and during that time he was confined in the prison and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his disciples, were his constant attendants; he discoursed with them upon different subjects with all his usual cheerfulness and serenity. He reproved them for their sorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved because he was to suffer though innocent, the philosopher replied, would you then have me die guilty? With this composure he spent his last days; he continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and instructed his pupils on questions of the greatest importance; he told them his opinions in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide. He disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison, he refused it, and asked with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death; where, says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler and made his escape certain, where shall I fly to avoid this irrevocable doom passed on all mankind? When the hour to drink the poison was come, the executioner presented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with composure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the influenced answer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wisest of mankind. Socrates died 400 years before Christ, in the 70th year of his age. He was no sooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty, his accusers were universally despised and shunned, one suffered death, some were banished, and others, with their own hands, put an end to the life which their severity to the best of the Athenians had rendered insupportable. The actions, sayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the most celebrated of his pupils, Xenophon and Plato, and every thing which relates to the life and circumstances of this great philosopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatness and splendour; and the learning which was universally disseminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a consciousness of their superiority over the rest of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exercises, which their writings celebrated. The philosophy of Socrates forms an interesting epoch in the history of the human mind. The son of Sophroniscus derided the more abstruse inquiries and metaphysical researches of his predecessors, and by first introducing moral philosophy, he induced mankind to consider themselves, their passions, their opinions, their duties, actions and faculties. From this it was said, that the founder of the Socratic school drew philosophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worship, Socrates was himself an example; he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a demon or invisible conductor, whose frequent interposition stopped him from the commission of evil, and the guilt of misconduct. This familiar spirit, however, according to some, was nothing more than a sound judgment assisted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general speculation of mankind could foresee what success would attend an enterprise, or what calamities would follow an ill-managed administration. [Mr. Nares thinks that Socrates, in the expressions usually understood to refer to his demon, alludes only to some species of divination, perfectly analogous to the omens of his age and country. He called the sign, whatever it was, by means of which he supposed intimations to be communicated to him, a demon or divinity.] As a supporter of the immortality of the soul, he allowed the perfection of a supreme knowledge, from which he deduced the government of the universe. From the resources of experience, as well as nature and observation, he perceived the indiscriminate dispensation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of heaven, and he was convinced that nothing but the most inconsiderate would incur the displeasure of their Creator to avoid poverty or sickness, or gratify a sensual appetite, which must at the end harass their soul with remorse and the consciousness of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquility of civil society depended upon the proper discharge of these respective duties. [Socrates must be regarded as the great parent of moral philosophy. Hence he is said to have drawn down philosophy from the skies to dwell among men.] The actions of men furnished materials also for his discourse: to instruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily lessons. From principles like these, which were enforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate husband, a tender parent, a warlike soldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, the celebrated sects of the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c. soon after arose. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many support that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly composed by him. He was naturally of a licentious disposition; and a physiognomist observed, in looking in the face of the philosopher, that his heart was the most depraved, immodest, and corrupted that ever was in the human breast. This nearly cost the satirist his life, but Socrates upbraided his disciples, who wished to punish the physiognomist, and declared that his assertions were true, but that all his vicious propensities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reason. Socrates made a poetical version of Æsop's fables while in prison. SOL, (the sun), was an object of veneration among the ancients. It was particularly worshipped by the Persians, under the name of Mithras; and was the Baal or Bel of the Chaldeans, the Belphegor of the Moabites, the Moloch of the Canaanites, the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Adonis of the Syrians. [vid. remarks to the article Hercules.] The Massagetæ sacrificed horses to the sun on account of their swiftness. It was originally called Æpeia, till Solon visited Cyprus, and advised Philocyprus, one of the princes of the island, to change the situation of his capital, [the approaches to which were steep and difficult, and the neighbourhood unfruitful.] His advice was followed, a new town was raised in a beautiful plain, and called after the name of the Athenian philosopher. SOLO, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was born at Salamis and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Echechtes, one of the descendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's side he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Pisistratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philosophical and political studies. Solon travelled over the greatest part of Greece: but at his return home he was distressed with the dissensions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He might have become absolute, but he refused the dangerous office of king of Athens, and in the capacity of lawgiver he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redress, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to seize the person of his debtor if unable to make a restoration of his money. After he had made the most salutary regulations in the state, and bound the Athenians by a solemn oath that they would faithfully observe his laws for the space of 10 years, Solon resigned the office of legislator, and removed himself from Athens. He visited Egypt, and in the court of Cræsus, king of Lydia, he convinced the monarch of the instability of fortune, and told him, when he wished to know whether he was not the happiest of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had seen his country in a flourishing state, who had seen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himself fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happiness than the possessor of riches and the master of empires. After ten years' absence, Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greatest part of his regulations disregarded by the factious spirit of his countrymen, and the usurpation of Pisistratus. Not to be longer a spectator of the divisions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 30th year of his age, 558 years before the Christian era. The salutary consequences of the laws of Solon can be discovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they flourished in full vigour, and Cicero, who was himself a witness of their benign influence, passes the highest encomiums upon the legislator, whose superior wisdom framed such a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four classes, three of which were permitted to discharge the most important offices and magistracies of the state, and the last to give their opinion in the assemblies, but not have a share in the distinctions and honours of their superiors, the legislator gave the populace a privilege which, though at first small and inconsiderable, soon rendered them masters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he increased the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to inquire how every citizen maintained himself, and to punish such as lived in idleness, and were not employed in some honourable and lucrative profession. He also regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges to 400. The sanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that against murder, and the punishment denounced against every offender was proportioned to his crime; but Solon made no law against parricide or sacrilege. The former of these crimes, he said, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, because the history of Athens had never furnished a single instance. Such as had died in the service of their country were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expense; but such as had squandered away their estates, such as refused to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and distress of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated, it became an union of affection and tenderness, and no longer a mercenary contract. To speak with ill language against the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legislator wished that the character of his fellow-citizens should be freed from the aspersions of malevolence and envy. A person that had no children was permitted to dispose of his estates as he pleased, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dress or expenses. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and associate of lewdness and debauchery was never permitted to speak in public, for, as the philosopher observed, a man who has no shame is not capable of being intrusted with the people. These celebrated laws were engraved on several tables, and, that they might be better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verse. The indignation which Solon expressed on seeing the tragical representations of Thespis is well known, and he sternly observed, that if falsehood and fiction were tolerated on the stage they would soon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Pisistratus, but this seems to be false, as the legislator refused to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow-citizens were trampled upon by the usurpation of a tyrant. SOMNUS, son of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and presided over sleep. His palace, according to some mythologists, is a dark cave, where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The dreams stand by him, and Morpheus, as his principal minister, watches to prevent the noise from awakening him. The Lacedæmonians always placed the image of Somnus near that of death. *Hesiod. SONCHIS, an Egyptian priest in the age of Solon. It was he who told that celebrated philosopher a number of traditions, particularly about the Atlantic isles, which he represented as more extensive than the continent of Africa and Asia united. Plut. in Isis. &c.

[SONUS, a river of India, falling into the Ganges, and now the Sonn-sou. As this river towards its origin is called Ando-nadi, it appears that the name Audomatis, (given also in Arrian) or rather Andonatis, can denote no other than it.]

SOPATER, a philosopher of Apamea, in the age of the emperor Constantine. He was one of the disciples of Iamblicus, and after his death he was at the head of the Platonic philosophers.

SOPHÈNE, a country of Armenia, [between the principal stream of the Euphrates and Mount Masius. It is now called Zoph.] Lucan. 2, v. 593.

SOPHOCLES, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, educated in the school of Æschylus, [was born at Colone in Attica, about 497 B. C. He studied music and dancing under Lamprus, and early distinguished himself in both these arts, particularly after the battle of Salamis, when he led a chorus of youths around a trophy, erected in honour of that victory, and attracted universal attention by the beauty of his person and the music of his lyre.] He distinguished himself not only as a poet, but also as a statesman. He commanded the Athenian armies, and in several battles he shared the supreme command with Pericles, and exercised the office of archon with credit and honour. [He first applied himself to lyric poetry, in which, had he persevered, he would have eminently distinguished himself, as the choruses of his tragedies show; but the reputation which Æschylus had acquired, and the bent of his own genius, led him to cultivate the tragic muse.] His first appearance as a tragic poet reflects great honour on his abilities. The Athenians had taken the island of Scyros, and to celebrate that memorable event, a yearly contest for tragedy was instituted. Sophocles on this occasion obtained the prize over many competitors, in the number of whom was Æschylus, his friend and his master. [Æschylus and Sophocles contended more than once for the prize. The age of Sophocles, when he was first declared the conqueror of his former preceptor, was only twenty-nine years. The judges on this occasion not being able to decide, the archon Apsephion referred the matter to Cimon and his nine colleagues who had just come from the battle of Eurymedon: these commanders adjudged the prize to Sophocles. The successful tragedy was called Triptolemus.] This success contributed to encourage the poet; he wrote for the stage with applause, and obtained the poetical prize 20 different times. Sophocles was the rival of Euripides for public praise, they divided the applause of the populace, and while the former surpassed in the sublime and majestic, the other was not inferior in the tender and pathetic. The Athenians were pleased with their contention, and as the theatre was at that time an object of importance and magnitude, and deemed an essential and most magnificent part of the religious worship, each had his admirers and adherents; but the two poets, captivated at last by popular applause, gave way to jealousy and rivalry. Of 120 tragedies which Sophocles composed, only seven are extant; Ajax, Electra, king Ædipus, Antigone, the Trachiniaz, Philoctetes, and Ædipus at Colonos. [It is probable that, instead of 120, Sophocles composed only about 70, tragedies. Of the seven which remain, the best is the Ædipus Rex, which may indeed be well supposed to have been the masterpiece of Sophocles: and yet it did not obtain the prize. It is certainly the finest tragedy of antiquity, as far as we have it in our power to judge.] The ingratitude of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wished to become immediate masters of their father's possessions, and therefore, tired of his long life, they accused him before the Areopagus of insanity. The only defence the poet made was to read his tragedy of Ædipus at Colonos, which he had lately finished, and then he asked his judges, whether the author of such a performance could be taxed with insanity? The father upon this was acquitted, and the children returned home covered with shame and confusion. Sophocles died in the 91st year of his age, 406 years before Christ, through excess of joy, as some authors report, of having obtained a poetical prize at the Olympic games. [Sophocles increased the number of actors to three, added the decoration of painted scenery, introduced more ease and elegance into the dialogue, and paid a stricter attention to probability and natural incident. His style is remarkable for dignity and beauty, approaching to the magnificence of the epic. It is always pure, perspicuous, and harmonious. He does not, like his rival Euripides, anticipate the subject and issue of his plots by any formal prologue, but evolves every incident in a gradual and natural manner, and carries the mind in a state of suspense until the final catastrophe. He manages his choruses also with better effect, by making their reflections and observations flow naturally from the characters which appear and the events which occur. In abridging the part of the chorus, Sophocles augmented the number of the episodes, or what are improperly called by us acts. As long as the chorus had formed the principal part of a tragedy, the actors had only occasionally interrupted their monologue. But the improvement introduced by Sophocles had the effect of making the action the more important part of the piece, which was now in turn occasionally interrupted by the chorus. Sophocles has been regarded as the most perfect tragic poet of all antiquity, and he has in consequence been styled the Homer of tragedy. His characters are great and heroic, and never, like those of Æschylus, rise above the level of human nature. Sophocles particularly excels in delineating the passions. From the sweetness and harmony of his periods he was called by the ancients the Attic bee.] The best editions of Sophocles are, that by Brunck, 6 vols. 8vo. 1786, [and that of Erfurd, Lips. 1802-3. 5 vols. 8vo.] Cic. in Cat. de Div. 1, c. 25.—Plut.

SOPHONISBA, a daughter of Asdrubal the Carthaginian, celebrated for her beauty. She married Syphax, a prince of Numidia, and when her husband was conquered by the Romans and Masinissa, she fell a captive into the hands of the enemy. Masinissa became enamoured of her, and married her. This behaviour displeased the Romans; and Scipio, who at that time had the command of the armies of the republic in Africa, rebuked the monarch severely, and commanded him to part with Sophonisba. This was an arduous task for Masinissa, yet he dreaded the Romans. He entered Sophonisba's tent with tears in his eyes, and told her that as he could not deliver her from captivity and the jealousy of the Romans, he recommended her as the strongest pledge of his love and affection for her person, to die like the daughter of Asdrubal. Sophonisba obeyed, and drank with unusual composure and serenity, the cup of poison which Masinissa sent to her, about 203 years before Christ. Liv. 30, c. 12, &c.—Sallust. de Jug.—Justin.

SOPHRONISCUS, the father of Socrates.

SORACTES and SORACTE, a mountain of Etruria, near the Tiber, seen from Rome, at the distance of 26 miles. It was sacred to Apollo, who is from thence surnamed Soractis, and it was said that the priests of the god could walk over burning coals without hurting themselves. There was, as some report, a fountain on Mount Soracte, whose waters boiled at sun-rise, and instantly killed all such birds as drank of them. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 93, l. 7, c. 2.—Horat. 1, Od. 9.—*Virg. SOSIBIUS, a grammarian of Laconia, B. C. 255. He was a great favourite of Ptolemy Philopator, and advised him to murder his brother, and the queen his wife, called Arsinoe. He lived to a great age, and was on that account called Polychronos. He was afterwards permitted to retire from the court, and spend the rest of his days in peace and tranquillity, after he had disgraced the name of minister by the most abominable crimes, and the murder of many of the royal family. His son of the same name was preceptor to king Ptolemy Epiphanes.—The preceptor of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. Tacit. 4, 11, c. 1.

SOSIGÈNES, an Egyptian mathematician, who assisted J. Cæsar in regulating the Roman calendar. [The philosopher, by tolerably accurate observations, discovered that the year was 365 days and 6 hours; and to make allowance for the odd hours, he invented the intercalation of one day in four years. The duplication of the 6th day before the calends of March was called the intercalary day, and the year in which this took place styled Bissextile. This was the Julian year, the reckoning by which commenced 45 B. C. and continued till it gave place to something more accurate, and still farther reformation, under Pope Gregory 13th. Sosigenes was the author of a commentary upon Aristotle's book "De Cœl."] Suet.—Diod.—Plin. 18, c. 25.

SOSII, celebrated booksellers at Rome, in the age of Horace, 1, ep. 20, v. 2.

SOSIPATER, a grammarian in the reign of Honorius. He published five books of observations on grammar.

SOSISTRATUS, a tyrant of Syracuse in the age of Agathocles. He invited Pyrrhus into Sicily, and afterwards revolted from him. He was at last removed by Hermocrates. Polyæn. 1.

SOSIUS, a Roman of consular dignity, to whom Plutarch dedicated his lives.

SOSPITA, a surname of Juno in Latium. Her most famous temple was at Lanuvium. She had also two at Rome, and her statue was covered with a goat-skin, with a buckle, &c. Liv. 3, 6, 8, &c.—Festus. de V. sig.

SOSTHÈNES, a general of Macedonia, who flourished B. C. 231. He defeated the Gauls under Brennus, and was killed in the battle. Justin. 24, c. 5.

SOSTRATUS, a grammarian in the age of Augustus. He was Strabo's preceptor. Strab. 14.—An architect of Cnidos, B. C. 234, who built the white tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He inscribed his name upon it. [*vid. SOTADES, an athlete.—A Greek poet of Thrace. He wrote verses against Philadelphus Ptolemy, for which he was thrown into the sea in a cage of lead. He was called Cinædus, not only because he was addicted to the abominable crime which the surname indicates, but because he wrote a poem in commendation of it. Some suppose that instead of the word Socratios in the 2d satire, verse the 10th of Juvenal, the word Sotadicus should be inserted, as the poet Sotades, and not the philosopher Socrates, deserved the appellation of Cinædus. Obscene verses were generally called Sotadia carmina from him. They could be turned and read different ways without losing their measure or sense, such as the following, which can be read backwards:

Si bene te tua laris taxat, sua laute tenebis.
Sole medere pede, ede, perede melos.*

Quintil. 1, c. 8, l. 9, c. 4.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.—Anson. ep. 17, v. 29.

SOTER, a surname of the first Ptolemy.—It was also common to other monarchs.

SOTERIA, days appointed for thanksgiving and the offerings of sacrifices for deliverance from danger. One of these was observed at Sicyon, to commemorate the deliverance of that city from the hands of the Macedonians by Aratus.

SOTERICUS, a poet and historian in the age of Dioclesian. He wrote a panegyric on that emperor, as also a life of Apollonius Tyanaeus. His works, greatly esteemed, are now lost, except some few fragments preserved by the scholiast of Lycophron.

SOTHIS, an Egyptian name of the constellation called Sirius, which received divine honours in that country.

SOTIATES, a people of Gaul conquered by Cæsar. [Their country, which formed part of Aquitania, extended along the Garumna, or Garonne, and their chief town was Sotiatum, now Sos. Cæs. Bell. G. 3. c. 20 and 21.

SOTION, a grammarian of Alexandria, preceptor to Seneca, B. C. 204. Senec. ep. 49 and 58.

SOZOMEN, an ecclesiastical historian, [born, according to some, at Salamis in the island of Cyprus, but, according to others, at Gaza or Bethulia, in Palestine.] He died 450 A. D. His history extends from the year 324 to 439, and is dedicated to Theodosius the younger, being written in a style of inelegance and mediocrity. [He is chargeable with several notorious errors in the relation of facts, and has incurred censure for his commendations of Theodorus of Mopsuesta, with whom originated the heresy of two persons in Christ. His history is usually printed with that of Socrates and the other ecclesiastical historians. The best edition is that of Reading, Cantab. 1720. fol. A work of Sozomen, not now extant, containing in two books, a summary account of the affairs of the church from the ascension of our Saviour to the defeat of Licinius, was written before his history.]

SPARTA, a celebrated city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, situate on the Eurotas, at the distance of about 30 miles from its mouth. It received its name from Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, who married Lacedæmon. It was also called Lacedæmon. [Sparta boasted of having no need of walls; it would seem from the accounts of modern travellers, that by being situated on a chain of eminences, which would, in those days, have been rendered impregnable by the contiguity of the habitations alone, and the long chain of rocks, which at once rendered unnecessary 880 yards of wall, she might well indulge in this boast. Epaminondas, who was the first Grecian commander that led an army before Sparta, did not, on this account dare to attack the city. The small hamlet on part of the site of ancient Sparta is now called Palaio Chori. The modern town of Misitra is about a mile to the south.]

SPARTACUS, a king of Bosphorus, who died B. C. 433. His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407.—Another, who died 284 B. C.—A Thracian shepherd, celebrated for his abilities and the victories he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentulus, he escaped from the place of his confinement with 30 of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself, and though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were increased by additional numbers, and better disciplined and more completely armed, he attacked the Roman generals in the field of battle. Two consuls and other officers were defeated with much loss; and Spartacus, superior in counsel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often deserted by his fickle attendants. Crassus was sent against him, but this celebrated general at first despaired of success. A bloody battle was fought, in which, at last, the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valour; when wounded in the leg, he fought on his knees, covering himself with his buckler in one hand, and using his sword with the other: and when at last he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans whom he had sacrificed to his fury, B. C. 71. In this battle no less than 40,000 of the rebels were slain, and the war totally finished. Flor. 3, c. 20.—Liv. 95.—Eutrop. 6, c. 2.—Plut. in Crass.—Patere. 2, c. 30.—Appian.

SPARTÆ, or SPARTI, a name given to those men who sprang from the dragon's teeth which Cadmus sowed. They all destroyed one another, except five, who survived, and assisted Cadmus in building Thebes.

SPARTANI, or SPARTIATÆ, the inhabitants of Sparta. [vid. Sparta and Lacedæmon.]

SPARTIANUS ÆLIUS, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of all the Roman emperors, from J. Cæsar to Dioclesian. He dedicated them to Dioclesian, to whom, according to some, he was related. Of these compositions, only the life of Adrian, Verus, Didius Julianus, Septimus Severus, Caracalla, and Geta, are extant, published among the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ. Spartianus is not esteemed as an historian or biographer.

SPERCHIA, a town of Thessaly on the banks of the Sperchius. Ptol.

SPERCHIUS, a river of Thessaly, rising on Mount Ceta, and falling into the sea in the bay of Malia, near Anticyra. The name is supposed to be derived from its rapidity (σπερχαυ, festinare.) Peleus vowed to the god of this river, the hair of his son Achilles, if ever he returned safe from the Trojan war. *Herodot. 7, c. 198.—Strab. 9.—Homer. SPERMATOPHAGI, a people who lived in the extremest parts of Egypt. They fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees.

SPEUSIPPUS, an Athenian philosopher, nephew, as also successor, of Plato. His father's name was Eurymedon, and his mother's Potone. He presided in Plato's school for eight years, and disgraced himself by his extravagance and debauchery. Plato attempted to check him, but to no purpose. He died of the lousy sickness, or killed himself according to some accounts, B. C. 339.—Plut. in Lys.—Diog. 4.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.

SPHACTERIA, [an island off the coast of Messenia, opposite Pylos. It was memorable for the capture of many of the noblest Lacedæmonians by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war.]

SPHERUS, a Greek philosopher, disciple to Zeno of Cyprus, 243 B. C. He came to Sparta in the age of Agis and Cleomenes, and opened a school there. Plut. in Ag.—Diog.

SPHINX, a monster which had the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and an human voice. It sprang from the union of Orthos with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been sent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wished to punish the family of Cadmus, which she persecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by proposing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas she proposed was explained. In this enigma she wished to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this Creon, king of Thebes, promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage to him who could deliver his country from the monster by a successful explanation of the enigma. It was at last happily explained by Œdipus, was observed that man walked on his hands and feet when young or in the morning of life, at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he supported his infirmities upon a stick. [vid. Œdipus.] The Sphinx no sooner heard this explanation than she dashed her head against a rock, and immediately expired. Some mythologists wish to unriddle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx, by the supposition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infested the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, because she had been refused a part of her father's possessions. The lion's paw expressed, as they observe, her cruelty, the body of the dog her lasciviousness, her enigmas the snares she laid for strangers and travellers, and her wings the dispatch she used in her expeditions. [The Sphinx was a favourite emblem among the ancient Egyptians, and served, according to some, as a type of the enigmatic nature of the Egyptian theology. M. Maillet is of opinion, that the union of the head of a virgin with the body of a lion, is a symbol of what happens in Egypt when the sun is in the signs of Leo and Virgo, and the Nile overflows. According to Herodotus, however, the Egyptians had also their Androsphynges, with the body of a lion and the face of a man. At the present day there still remains, about 300 paces east of the second pyramid, a celebrated statue of a sphinx, cut in the solid rock. Formerly, nothing but the head, neck, and top of the back were visible, the rest being sunk in the sand. It was, at an expense of £800 or £900, (contributed by some European gentlemen,) cleared from the accumulated sand in front of it under the superintendance of Captain Caviglia. This monstrous production consists of a virgin's head joined to the body of a quadruped. The body is principally formed out of the solid rock; the paws are of masonry, extending forward fifty feet from the body; between the paws are several sculptured tablets so arranged as to form a small temple; and farther forward a square altar with horns. The length of the statue, from the fore-part of the neck to the tail, is 125 feet. The face has been disfigured by the arrows and lances of the Arabs, who are taught by their religion to hold all images of men or animals in detestation. In the article Pyramides some remarks are offered upon a sphinx's head and other ancient remains found on the banks of the Kuban.] Plut.—*Hesiod. SPINA, now Primaro, a town on the [Ostium Spineticum, or] most southern part of the Po. [Spina was of Pelasgic origin. The name Eridanus, afterwards applied to the Po at large, is said by some to have belonged originally to the Ostium Spineticum.] Plin. 3, c. 16.

SPOLETUM, now Spoletto, a town of Umbria, [north-east of Interamna, which bravely withstood Annibal after the battle of the lake Thrasymenus. It was, in after ages, the residence of some of the Gothic kings, and, under the government of Longinus, exarch of Ravenna, was made the capital of Umbria.] The people were called Spoletani. Water is conveyed to the town from a neighbouring fountain by an aqueduct of such a great height, that in one place the top is raised above the foundation 230 yards. An inscription over the gates still commemorates the repulse of Annibal. Mart. 13, ep. 120.

SPORADES, a number of islands in the Ægean Sea, [off the coast of Caria.] They received their name σπάργω, spargo, because they are scattered in the sea. Mela, 2, c. 7. —Strab. 2.

SPURINA, a mathematician and astrologer, who told J. Cæsar to beware of the ides of March. As he went to the senate-house on the morning of the ides, Cæsar said to Spurina, the ides are at last come. Yes, replied Spurina, but not yet past. Cæsar was murdered a few moments after. Suet. in Cæs. 81.—Val. Max. 1 and 8.

SPURIUS, a prænomen common to many of the Romans.—One of Cæsar's murderers. —Lartius, a Roman who defended the bridge over the Tiber against Porsenna's army.

STASICRATES, a statuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a statue of Mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror, &c.

STATILIUS, a young Roman celebrated for his courage and constancy. He was an inveterate enemy to Cæsar, and when Cato murdered himself, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conspirators against Cæsar wished him to be in the number, but the answer which he gave displeased Brutus. He was at last killed by the army of the triumvirs. Plut.

STATIRA, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander. The conqueror had formerly refused her, but when she had fallen into his hands at Issus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon splendour. No less than 9000 persons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup, to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana, after the conqueror's death. Justin. 12, c. 12.—A sister of Darius the last king of Persia. She also became his wife according to the manners of the Persians. She died after an abortion, in Alexander's camp, where she was detained as a prisoner. She was buried with great pomp by the conqueror. Plut. in Alex.—A wife of Artaxerxes Mnemon, poisoned by her mother-in-law, queen Parysatis. Plut. in Art.—A sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

STATIUS, (Cæcilius), a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a slave. His latinity was bad, yet he acquired great reputation by his comedies.

He died a little after Ennius. Cic. de sen.

—P. Papinius, a poet born at Naples in the reign of the emperor Domitian. His father's name was Statius of Epirus, and his mother's Agelina. [He early displayed a lively disposition and good talents, and soon became a votary of the muses, with so much success, that during his father's life he obtained the crown in the poetical contests of his native place. He was also thrice a victor in the poetical games celebrated at Alba. A piece which he recited at Rome, in the quinquennial games instituted by Nero and renewed by Domitian, procured for him a golden crown from that emperor, and admission to his table.] Statius has made himself known by two epic poems, the Thebais in 12 books, and the Achilleis in two books, which remain unfinished on account of his premature death. There are besides other pieces composed on several subjects, which are extant, and well known under the name of Sylvæ, divided into four books. The two epic poems of Statius are dedicated to Domitian, whom the poet ranks among the gods. Statius, as some suppose, was poor, and he was obliged to maintain himself by writing for the stage. None of his dramatic pieces are extant; and what Juvenal has written in his praise, some have interpreted as an illiberal reflection upon him. [Juvenal rather expresses commiseration for the poet. Statius, it seems, was vanquished in a contest at the Roman games, on which occasion he recited a part of his principal poem, the Thebaid. According to Juvenal, he was heard with delight by a crowd of auditors in other public recitations of his poem; the satirist at the same time intimating, that, notwithstanding this applause, the author might have starved, had he not sold a new composition, his Agave, to the actor Paris, Domitian's favourite. Statius died about the 100th year of the Christian era. The poems of Statius display a considerable share of real genius and talent, but are vitiated by the false taste which then began to infest Latin poetry, and gave a turn to turgid and unnatural thoughts and expressions. Several pieces in the Sylvæ are, however, pleasing and elegant. His principal work, the Thebaid, holds no mean rank among epic poems, and once it was a great favourite among the remains of antiquity. For this preference it was indebted to its swelling sentiments, verging to bombast, and to the savage and sanguinary character of its incidents which suited the times of chivalrous turbulence. But still, even with these faults, it exhibits strokes of the real sublime, and considerable force and novelty in natural description, especially in the similies.] The best editions of his works are that of Barthius, 2 vols. 4to. Cyg. 1664, that of the Variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671, [that in Usum Delphini, Paris, 1685, 2 vols. 4to. and that of Gronovius, Manh. 1783, 2 vols. 8vo. and of the Thebais, separate, that of Markland, Lond. 1728, 4to.]

STATOR, a surname of Jupiter, given him

by Romulus, because he stopped (sto) the flight of the Romans in a battle against the Sabines. The conqueror erected him a temple under that name. Liv. 1, c. 12.

STELLĀTIS, a field remarkable for its fertility in Campania. Cic. Ag. 1, c. 70.—Suet. Cæs. 20.

STELLIO, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, because he derided the goddess, who drank with avidity when tired and afflicted in her vain pursuit of her daughter Proserpine. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 445.

STENOBEA. vid. Sthenobœa.

STENTOR, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice was louder than that of 50 men together. Homer. Il. 5, v. 784.—Juv. 13, v. 112.

STENTORIS LACUS, a lake near Enos in Thrace. Herodot. 7, c. 58.

STEPHĀNUS, [a grammarian who flourished, as is conjectured, about the close of the 5th century. He was professor in the imperial college at Constantinople, and composed a dictionary containing adjectives derived from the names of places, and designating the inhabitants of those places. Of this work there exists only an abridgment made by Hermolaus, and dedicated to the emperor Justinian. This work was known by the title, Περί πόλεων, De Urbibus, but that of the original was Ἑθνικά; hence it has been inferred that the author's intention was to write a geographical work. It seems that Stephanus, who is usually quoted by the title of Stephanus Byzantinus, or Stephanus of Byzantium, not only gave in his original work a catalogue of countries, cities, nations, and colonies; but, as opportunity offered, he described the characters of different nations, mentioned the founders of cities, and related the mythological traditions connected with each place, mingled with grammatical and etymological remarks. All this appears not in the meagre abridgment of Hermolaus. We have a fragment, however, remaining of the original work relative to Dodona. The best edition of Stephanus is that of Gronovius, L. Bat. 1688, fol.]

STERŌPE, one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married Œnomaus, king of Pisæ, by whom she had Hippodamia, &c.

STESICHŌRUS, [a Greek lyric poet, born at Himera, in Sicily, and who flourished about 612 B. C. To him we owe the first introduction of the triple division into strophe, antistrophe, and epode, which are called in a Greek proverb, "The three things of Stesichorus." Hence he is said to have derived his name of Stesichorus, "placér or arranger of the chorus." His previous name was Tisias. His compositions were written in the Doric dialect, and comprised in 26 books, all now lost except a few fragments. These amount to 50 or 60 lines, and are printed in the collections of Fulvius Ursinus, Antv. 1568. Stesichorus possessed, according to Dionysius, all the excellencies and graces of Pindar and Simonides, and surpassed them both in the grandeur of his subjects, in which he well preserved the characteristics of manners and persons: and Quintilian represents him as having displayed the sublimity of his genius by the selection of weighty topics, such as important wars and the actions of great commanders, in which he sustained with his lyre the dignity of epic poetry. Accordingly Alexander the Great ranks him among those who were the proper study of princes.] Some say he lost his eye-sight for writing invectives against Helen, and that he received it only upon making a recantation of what he had said. He was the inventor of that fable of the horse and stag, which Horace and some other poets have imitated, and this he wrote to prevent his countrymen from making an alliance with Phalaris. According to some, he was the first who wrote an epithalamium. He flourished 556 B. C. and died at Catania, in the 85th year of his age. Isocrat. in Hel.—Aristot. Rhet.—Strab. 3.—Lucian. in Macr.—Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 35.—Plut. de Mus.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 19, l. 10, c. 26.

STHENĒLUS, a king of Mycenæ, son of Perseus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters, and a son called Eurystheus, who was born, by Juno's influence, two months before the natural time, that he might obtain a superiority over Hercules, as being older. Sthenelus made war against Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon, and seized his kingdom. He fought with success, and took his enemy prisoner, whom he transmitted to Eurystheus. Homer. Il. 19, v. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—A son of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni and of the suitors of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of those who were shut up in the wooden horse, according to Virgil. Paus. 2, c. 18.—Virg. Æn. 2 and 10.

STHENOBÆA, a daughter of Jobates, king of Lycia, who married Prætus, king of Argos. She became enamoured of Bellerophon, who had taken refuge at her husband's court, after the murder of his brother, and when he refused to gratify her criminal passion, she accused him before Prætus of attempts upon her virtue. According to some she killed herself after his departure. Homer. Il. 6, v. 162.—Hygin. fab. 57.—Many mythologists called her Antæa.

STILBO, a name given to the planet Mercury by the ancients for its shining appearance. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 20.

STILICHO, a general of the emperor Theodosius the Great. He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he showed himself turbulent and disaffected. As being of barbarian extraction, he wished to see the Roman provinces laid desolate by his countrymen, but in this he was disappointed. Honorius discovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded about the year of Christ 408. His family were involved in his ruin. [The apparent piety of Olympius, the favourite of Honorius, has induced the ecclesiastical historians to treat the character of Stilicho with great severity; but Zosimus;

though upon the whole not favourable to him, acquits him of the treason laid to his charge, and the poetry of Claudian eulogises him as the hero of his age.]

STILPO, a celebrated philosopher of Megara, who flourished 336 years before Christ, and was greatly esteemed by Ptolemy Soter. He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a school at Megara. He was universally respected, his school was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered Megara, ordered the house of the philosopher to be left safe and unmolested. [Stilpo excited prejudices by not paying respect to the Athenian superstitions, but there is no proof of his infidelity with respect to the existence of a supreme divinity. On moral topics he is said to have taught that the highest felicity consists in a mind free from the dominions of passion, a doctrine similar to that of the Stoics. He lived to a great age, and is said to have hastened his final departure by a draught of wine.] Plut. in Dem.—Diog. 2.—Seneca. de Const.

STOBÆUS, a Greek writer who flourished A. D. 405. [He was the author of several works, none of which have reached our times except the fragments of a collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers. Fabricius thinks that he was not a Christian, since his extracts are exclusively from heathen authors. The best editions of Stobæus are that of Heeren. Goett. 1792, and that of Schow, Lips. 1797.]

STONI, [the principal city of Pæonia in Macedonia, lying due north from Edessa. It became the metropolis of one of the two provinces into which Macedonia was subsequently divided.] Liv. 33, c. 19, l. 40, c. 21.

STŒCHADÆS, five small islands in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gaul, now the Hieres, near Marseilles. They were called Ligustides by some, but Pliny speaks of them as only three in number. [They were called Stœchades from their being ranged on the same line, στοιχος.] Steph. Byzant.—Lucan. 3, v. 516.—Strab. 4.

STOICI, a celebrated sect of philosophers founded by Zeno of Citium. They received the name from the portico, stoa, where the philosopher delivered his lectures. [This was the "Poecile," or porch adorned with various paintings from the pencil of Polygnotus and other eminent masters, and hence was called by way of eminence, the porch. An account of the Stoic doctrine will be found at the end of the article Zeno.]

STRABO, a name among the Romans, given to those whose eyes were naturally deformed or distorted. Pompey's father was distinguished by that name.—A native of Amasea, a city of Pontus, but in what year is uncertain. [From his acquaintance with Caius Gallus, prefect of Egypt, and from his having composed his geography in the fourth year of the reign of Tiberius, it has been inferred that he flourished in the first century, and Blair assigns his death to the year 25

A. D.] He first studied under Xenarchus the peripatetic, and afterwards warmly embraced the tenets of the Stoics [on leaving Xenarchus. He was induced by Athenodorus of Tarsus to join this latter sect. He visited, in the course of his travels, Asia Minor, Syria, Phœnicia, and Egypt as far as Syene and the cataracts of the Nile. He traversed also, Greece, Macedonia, and Italy, excepting Cisaipine Gaul and Liguria. It is of importance to mention his travels, as it heightens the value of his geographical remarks in those countries where he was an eye-witness; for in the rest he only compiles from others.] Of all his compositions nothing remains but his geography, divided into 17 books, a work justly celebrated for its elegance, purity, the erudition and universal knowledge of the author. It contains an account, in Greek, of the most celebrated places of the world, the origin, the manners, religion, prejudices, and government of nations; the foundation of cities, and the accurate history of each separate province. In the two first books the author wishes to show the necessity of geography. [The second contains a criticism on the work of Eratosthenes, continued from the first book; after which he passes to an examination of the works of Posidonius and Polybius. The rest of the book is devoted to the knowledge requisite for a geographer.] In the 3d he gives a description of Spain; in the 4th of Gaul and the British isles, [and also of Thule, and the Alps.] The 5th and 6th contain an account of Italy and the neighbouring islands; the 7th, which is mutilated at the end, gives a full description of Germany, and the country of the Getæ, Illyricum, Taurica Chersonesus, and Epirus. The affairs of Greece and the adjacent island are separately treated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th; and in the four next, Asia within Mount Taurus; and in the 15th and 16th, Asia without Taurus, India, Persia, Syria, and Arabia; the last book gives an account of Egypt, Æthiopia, Carthage, and other places of Africa. Among the books of Strabo which have been lost, were historical commentaries. This celebrated geographer died A. D. 25. [We have also a Chrestomathy, or abridgment of this writer, made about 980 A. D. by which the text of the main work has often been corrected. The main work has reached us in a very corrupt state, on account as well of the numerous lacunæ in the single manuscript whence the rest have been copied, as on account of the copyists having often attempted to supply what was illegible.] The best editions of his geography are, those of Casaubon, fol. Paris, 1620; and of Amst. 2 vols. fol. 1707. [To these may be added the Leipsic edition of Siebenkees, continued after his death by Tschucke: on the death of this latter editor the work was continued by Friedeman as far as the 7th vol. where it has remained since the year 1818. The Oxford edition of Strabo by Falconer, published in 1809, also deserves mention, although it has not satisfied the expecta-tious that were formed of it. This is the edition, a review of which gave rise in part to the controversy in 1809-10 between the Edinburgh Reviewers and the Oxford scholars. The best Greek text of Strabo, however, is that of Coray, Paris, 1818, 4 vols. 8vo. It wants the Latin version, but is accompanied by an excellent commentary and many tables.]—A Sicilian, so clear-sighted that he could distinguish objects at the distance of 130 miles with the same ease as if they had been near.

STRATO, or STRATON, a philosopher of Lampsacus, disciple and successor in the school of Theophrastus, [in the Peripatetic school of which he took charge B. C. 286, and continued over it for 18 years, with a high reputation for learning and eloquence.] He applied himself with uncommon industry to the study of nature, and was surnamed Physicus, and after the most mature investigations, he supported that nature was inanimate, and that there was no God but nature. He was appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who not only revered his abilities and learning, but also rewarded his labours with unbounded liberality. He wrote different treatises, all now lost. [In his opinion concerning matter, Strato departed essentially from the system both of Plato and Aristotle, and he is said to have nearly approached that system of Atheism which excludes the deity from the formation of the world. Cicero states that this philosopher conceived all divine power to be seated in nature, which possesses the causes of production, increase, and diminution, but is wholly destitute of sensation and figure. He taught, also, that the seat of the soul is in the middle of the brain, and that it only acts by means of the senses.] Diog. 5.—Cic. Acad. 1, c. 9, l. 4, c. 38, &c.—A physician.

STRATON. vid. Strato.

STRATONICE, a daughter of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who married Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and became mother of Attalus. Strab. 13.—A daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who married Seleucus, king of Syria. Antiochus, her husband's son by a former wife, became enamoured of her, and married her with his father's consent, when the physicians had told him that if he did not comply, his son's health would be impaired. Plut. in Dem.—Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—A concubine of Mithridates, king of Pontus. Plut. in Pomp.—The wife of Antigonus, mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.—A town of Caria, [north-east of Mylassa,] made a Macedonian colony. Strab. 14.—Liv. 33, c. 18 and 33.—Another in Mesopotamia.—And a third near Mount Taurus, [called Stratonicæa ad Taurum by Strabo, in order to distinguish it from the Carian city of the same name.]

STRATONICUS, an opulent person in the reign of Philip, and of his son Alexander, whose riches became proverbial. Plut.

STRATONIS TURRIS, a city of Judea, afterwards called Cæsarea by Herod in honour of Augustus. [vid. Cæsarea.]

STRATOS, a city of Æolia. Liv. 36, c. 11, l. 38, c. 4.—Of Acarnania.

STRENUA, a goddess at Rome who gave vigour and energy to the weak and indolent. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11 and 16.

STRONGÏLE, now Strombolo, [one of the Lipari isles, or the first of the Æoliæ insulæ to the north-east. It was called Strongyle (Στρογγυλη)] by the Greeks, on account of its round figure. It is celebrated for its extraordinary volcano, which is the only one known whose eruptions are continued and uninterrupted. The island is, in fact, merely a single mountain, whose base is about nine miles in circumference. The crater is supposed to have been anciently situated on the summit of the mountain, it is now on the side. From various testimonies collected by Spallanzani, he concludes that the volcano has burned for more than a century where it now does, without any sensible change in its situation. The same writer is of opinion that the material origin and increase of Stromboli is to be attributed to porphyry, which, melted by subterraneous conflagrations, and rarified by elastic gaseous substances, arose from the bottom of the sea, and extending itself on the sides in lavas and scorizæ, has formed an island of its present size. The earliest eruptions of Stromboli, authenticated by historical accounts, are prior to the Christian era by about 290 years, the date of the reign of Agathocles of Syracuse. It burned, likewise, in the time of Augustus and Tiberius. After this latter period, a long succession of ages ensued, during which, from the want of historical documents, we are ignorant of the state of Stromboli. In the 17th century we again know that it ejected fire, which it has continued to do to the present time.] Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 10, c. 11.

STROPHÆDES, two islands in the Ionian Sea, on the western coasts of the Peloponnesus. They were anciently called Ploteæ, and received the name of Strophades from στροφα, verto, because Zethes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, returned from thence by order of Jupiter, after they had driven the Harpies there from the tables of Phineus. The fleet of Æneas stopped near the Strophades. The largest of these two islands is not above five miles in circumference. They are now called Strivah.] Hygin. fab. 19.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 210.

STROPHIUS, a son of Crisus, king of Phocis. He married a sister of Agamemnon, called Anaxabia, or Astyoehia, or, according to others, Cyndragora, by whom he had Py-lades, celebrated for his friendship with Orestes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra and Ægysthus, the king of Phocis educated at his own house, with the greatest care, his nephew whom Electra had secretly removed from the power of his mother and her adulterer. Orestes was enabled by means of Strophius, to revenge the death of his father. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Hygin. fab. 1, 17.

STRYMA, a town of Thrace, founded by a Thracian colony. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

STRYMON, a river [rising in Mount Hæmus,] which separates Thrace from Macedonia, and falls into a part of the Ægean Sea, which has been called Strymonicus Sinus, or Gulf of Contessa. A number of cranes, as the poets say, resorted on its banks in the summer time. Its eels were excellent. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 120, l. 4, v. 508. Æn. 10, v. 265.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 251.

STYMPHALIA, STYMPHĀLIS, a part of Macedonia. Liv. 45, c. 30.—A surname of Diana.

STYMPHĀLUS, a king of Arcadia, son of Elatus and Laodice. He made war against Pelops, and was killed in a truce. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—A town, river, lake, and fountain, [in the north-east part] of Arcadia, which receives its name from king Stymphalus. The neighbourhood of the lake Stymphalus was infested with a number of voracious birds, like cranes or storks, which fed upon human flesh, and which were called Stymphalides. They were at last destroyed by Hercules, with the assistance of Minerva. Some have confounded them with the Harpies, while others pretend that they never existed but in the imagination of the poets. Pausanias, however, supports, that there were carnivorous birds, like the Stymphalides, in Arabia. [Some have explained the fable by supposing that robbers laid waste the country, and robbed passengers on the confines of the lake. These Hercules and his companions destroyed, and hence it is said sprung the fable of the birds Stymphalides.] Paus. 8, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 298.

STYX, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom she had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valour. Hesiod. Theog. 363 and 384.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to some writers the Styx was a small river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and deadly that they proved fatal to such as tasted them. Among others, Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal effects, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea that it was a river of hell, especially when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration that they always swore by them: an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and to all their original privileges. It is said that this veneration was shown to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who with her three daughters assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 74.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 29, &c.—Lucan. 6, v. 378, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 17 and 18.—Curt. 10, c. 10.

SUADA, the goddess of persuasion, called Pittho by the Greeks. She had a form of worship established to her honour first by Theseus. She had a statue in the temple of Venus Praxis at Megara. Cic. de El. Orat. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 22 and 43, l. 9, c. 35.

[SUAUSTUS, a river of India falling into the Indus near the modern city of Attock. D'Anville makes the modern name of the Suastus to be the Suvat. Mannert supposes this to be the same river with that called Choaspes by Strabo and Curtius, and the name Suastus, which is used by Ptolemy in speaking of this stream, to be an error.]

SUBLICIUS, the first bridge erected at Rome over the Tiber. vid. Pons.

SUBURRA, a street in Rome where all the licentious, dissolute, and lascivious Romans and courtizans resorted. It was situate between Mount Viminalis and Quirinalis, and was remarkable as having been the residence of the obscurer years of J. Cæsar. [So far from being the residence of the vile and abandoned, the Suburra was on the contrary the abode of the great and gay. Julius Cæsar was born in that part of the Suburra which was situate on the Esquiline hill.] Suet. in Cæs.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 8, Martial. 6, ep. 66.—Juv. 3, v. 5.

SUCRO, now Xucar, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, celebrated for a battle fought there between Sertorius and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. Plut.

SUËSSA, a town of Campania, called also Aurunca, to distinguish it from Suessa Pomætia, the capital of the Volsci. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Liv. 1 and 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.—Cic. Phil. 3, c. 4, l. 4, c. 2.

SUËSSIONES, [a people of Gallia Belgica, whose country was bounded on the south by Matrona, the Marne. Their capital, Augusta, afterwards Suessiones, now Soissons, stands on Oxona, the Aisne. They were subdued by Cæsar.] Cæs. Bell. G. 2.

SUETONIUS, C. Paulinus, the first Roman general who crossed Mount Atlas with an army, of which expedition he wrote an account. He presided over Britain as a governor for about 20 years, and was afterwards made consul. He forsook the interest of Otho, and attached himself to Vitellius.—C. Tranquillus, a Latin historian, son of a Roman knight of the same name, [born about the beginning of the reign of Vespasian, and died after A. D. 117.] He was favoured by Adrian, and became his secretary, but he was afterwards banished from the court for his indiscreet familiarity towards the empress Sabina. In his retirement Suetonius enjoyed the friendship and correspondence of Pliny the younger, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote an history of the Roman kings, divided into three books; a catalogue of all the illustrious men of Rome, a book on the games and spectacles of the Greeks, &c. which are all now lost. The only one of his compositions extant is the lives of the twelve first Cæsars, and some fragments of his catalogue of celebrated grammarians. [His account of the lives of the emperors forms one of the most interesting remains of ancient history: for, without being distinguished by style or sentiment, it abounds with anecdotes relative to the manners, characters, and incidents of those times which no where else occur. Some of the facts which he relates have been doubted, but his general character and mode of writing narratives, acquit him of any intentional misrepresentation.] His expressions, however, are often too indelicate; and it has been justly observed, that while he exposed the vices of the Cæsars, he wrote with all the licentiousness with which they lived. The best editions of Suetonius are that of Pitiscus, 4to. 2 vols. Leovard. 1714; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1751; and that of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips. 1775. [The best now is that of Crusius, Lips. 1816-18, 3 vols. 8vo.] Plin. 1, ep. 18, l. 5, ep. 11, &c.

SUËVI, a people of Germany, between the Elbe and the Vistula, [on the northern side of the Hercynia Silva,] who made frequent excursions upon the territories of Rome under the emperors. [Lucan calls them Flavi, from their having in general reddish hair, which their name is likewise said to signify.] Lucan. 2, v. 51.

SUFFENUS, a Latin poet in the age of Catullus. He was but of moderate abilities, but puffed up with a high idea of his own excellence, and therefore deservedly exposed to the ridicule of his contemporaries. Catull. 22.

SUFETIUS, or SUFETIUS. vid. Metius.

SUIDAS, a Greek writer. [So little is known of Suidas, that some have doubted whether a person of this name ever existed. His name, however, is found in all the MSS. of his Lexicon, and is often mentioned by Eustathius in his commentary on Homer. He seems to have flourished between 900 and 1025 B. C. He is the author of a Lexicon compiled from various authors. It differs essentially from other works of this kind, in giving not only the explanation of words, but, at the same time, an historical notice of the most celebrated authors, and extracts from their works. On account of the peculiar uniformity of style which prevails in the biographical notices, it has been conjectured that Suidas borrowed them all from some Onomasticon; and from an expression which he himself uses in the article Hesychius, some have been led to believe that a work of the latter furnished him with his chief materials. In making his compilation, however, Suidas has shown great negligence, and a total want of judgment and critical talent. He cites from vitiated and corrupt readings, he confounds individuals and authors, and oftentimes his citations do not prove what he intends. It is uncertain whether the carelessness of copyists may not have been the cause of many of these errors. Notwithstanding its errors and imperfections, it is a very useful book, and a storehouse of all sorts of erudition. It furnishes an account of poets, orators, historians, &c. with many passages from ancient authors whose works are lost.] The best edition is that of Kuster, 3 vols. fol. Contab. 1705.]

SUIONES, a nation of ancient Scandinavia, supposed the modern Swedes. Tacit. de Germ. c. 44.

SULCIUS, an informer whom Horace describes as hoarse with the number of defamations he daily gave. Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 65.

SULGA, now Sorgue, a small river of Gaul falling into the Rhone. Strab. 4.

SULLA. vid. Sylla.

SULMO, now Sulmona, an ancient town of the Peligni, at the distance of about 90 miles from Rome. Ovid was born there. Ovid. passim.—Ital. 8, v. 511.—Strab. 5.

SULPITIA, a daughter of Paterculus, who married Fulvius Flaccus. She was so famous for her chastity, that she consecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddess who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. Plin. 7, c. 35.—A poetess in the age of Domitian, against whom she wrote a poem because he had banished the philosophers from Rome. This composition is still extant. She had also written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, ep. 35, now lost.

SULPITIA LEX, militaris, by C. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665, invested Marius with the full power of the war against Mithridates, of which Sylla was to be deprived.—Another, de senatu, by Servius Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It required that no senators should owe more than 2000 drachmæ.—Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It ordered that the new citizens who composed the eight tribes lately created, should be divided among the 35 old tribes, as a greater honour.—Another, called also Sempronia de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, consuls, A. U. C. 449. It forbade any person to consecrate a temple or altar without the permission of the senate and the majority of the tribunes.

SULPITIUS, or SULPICIUS, an illustrious family at Rome, of whom the most celebrated are—Peticus, a man chosen dictator against the Gauls. His troops mutinied when first he took the field, but soon after he engaged the enemy and totally defeated them. Liv. 7.—C. Paterculus, a consul sent against the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. Id. 17.—Spurius, one of the three commissioners whom the Romans sent to collect the best laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece. Id. 3, c. 10.—One of the first consuls who received intelligence that a conspiracy was formed in Rome to restore the Tarquins to power, &c.—P. Galba, a Roman consul who signalized himself greatly during the war which his countrymen waged against the Achæans and the Macedonians.—Severus, a writer. vid. Severus.—Publius, one of the associates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made some laws in favour of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his anti-senatorial band, and with these he had often the impertinence to attack the consul in the popular assemblies. He became at last so seditious, that he was proscribed by Sylla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole in the rostrum, where he had often made many seditious speeches in the capacity of tribune. Liv. 77.—C. Longus, a Roman consul, who defeated the Samnites, and killed 30,000 of their men. He obtained a triumph for this celebrated victory. He was afterwards made dictator to conduct a war against the Etrurians.—Gallus, a celebrated astrologer in the age of Paulus. [vid. Gallus.]—Apollinaris, a grammarian in the age of the emperor M. Aurelius. He left some letters and a few grammatical observations now lost. Cic.—Liv.—Plut.—Polyb.—Flor.—Eutrop.

SUMMANUS, a surname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, summus manium. He had a temple at Rome erected during the wars with Pyrrhus, and the Romans believed that the thunderbolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de div.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 731.

SUNIUM, a promontory of Attica, about 30 miles distant from the Piræus. There was there a small harbour, as also a town. Minerva had there a beautiful temple, whence she was called Sunias. There are still extant some ruins of this temple. [Nine columns, without their entablatures, front the sea, in a line from west-north-west to east-south-east; three are standing on the side towards the land, on the north; and two, with a pilaster, next to the corner-one of the northern columns, towards the sea on the east; and there is a solitary one on the south-eastern side. This last has obtained for the promontory, the name of Cape Colonna, or the cape of the column. Sunium was considered by the Athenians an important post, and as much a town as the Piræus, but could not have been very large, according to Hobhouse, who is of opinion that when Euripides styles it the "rich rock of Sunium" in his Cyclops, he alludes to the wealth of the temple, not to the fertility of the soil. The same writer justly considers the assertion of Pausanias to be unworthy of belief, when he states that the spear and the crest of the statue of Minerva in the Acropolis might be seen from Sunium, a straight line of nearly 30 miles.] Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 1, c. i.—Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3, l. 13, ep. 10.

SUOVETAURILIA, a sacrifice among the Romans, which consisted of the immolation of a sow (sus), a sheep (ovis), and a bull (taurus) whence the name. It was generally observed every fifth year.

SUPERUM MARE, a name of the Adriatic Sea, because it was situate above Italy. The name of Mare Inferum was applied for the opposite reasons to the sea below Italy. Cic. pro Cluent. &c.

SURA, a writer in the age of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote an history of the reign of the emperor.—A city on the Euphrates, —Another in Iberia.—A river of Germany whose waters fall into the Moselle. Auc. in Mos.

SURENA, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes, king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Parthia. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia against Crassus, who wished to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perfidiously to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off. He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B. C. 52. Surena has been admired for his valour, his sagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmness in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his lasciviousness, have been deservedly censured. Polyæn. 7.—Plut. in Crass.

SURRENTUM, a town of Campania, on the bay of Naples, famous for the wine which was made in the neighbourhood. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 17, v. 52.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 710.—Mart. 13, ep. 110.

SUSA, (orum), a celebrated city of Asia, the chief town of Susiana, and the capital of the Persian empire. [It is called in Scripture Shushan, and was built on the banks of the Eulæus, called, by the prophet Daniel, Ulai. Some ascribe its erection to Memnon, but see remarks under that article. It was called Susa from the number of lilies in its vicinity, which, in the Persian language, bore that name.] Cyrus took it. The walls of Susa were above 120 stadia in circumference. The treasures of the king of Persia were generally kept there, and the royal palace was built with white marble, and its pillars were covered with gold and precious stones. [Alexander found in it 50,000 talents of gold, besides jewels of inestimable value, and an immense quantity of gold and silver vessels.] It was usual with the kings of Persia to spend the summer at Ecbatana, and the winter at Susa, because the climate was more warm there than at any other royal residence. [Some have supposed that the present city of Shuster arose from the ruins of the ancient Susa.] Plin. 6, c. 26, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 49.

—Strab. 15.—Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, el. 13.—Claudian.

SUSARION, a Greek poet of Megara, who is supposed with Dolon to have been the inventor of comedy, and to have first introduced it at Athens on a moveable stage, B. C. 562.

SUSIANI, or SUSIS, a country of Asia, of which the capital was called Susa, situate at the east of Assyria. Lilies grow in great abundance in Susiana, and it is from that plant that the province received its name, according to some, as Shushan is the name of a lily in Persian.

SUSIDÆ PYLÆ, narrow passes over mountains, from Susiana into Persia Curt. 5, c. 3.

SUTHUL, a town of Numidia where the king's treasures were kept. Sall. Jug. 37.

SUTRIUM, a town of Etruria, about 24 miles north-west of Rome. Some suppose that the phrase Ire Sutrium, to act with dispatch, arises from the celerity with which Camillus recovered the place, but Festus explains it differently. Plaut. Ces. 3, 1, v. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 34.—Patere. 1, c. 14.—Liv. 9, c. 32.

SYÆGRUS, an ancient poet, the first who wrote on the Trojan war. He is called Sagaris, by Diogenes Laertius, who adds, that he lived in Homer's age, of whom he was the rival. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 21.

SYBÆRIS, a river of Lucania in Italy, whose waters were said to render men more strong and robust. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 11, l. 31, c. 2.—There was a town of the same name, on its banks on the bay of Tarentum, which had been founded by a colony of Achæans. Sybaris became very powerful, and in its most flourishing situation it had the command of four neighbouring nations, of 25 towns, and could send an army of 30,000 men into the field. The walls of the city were said to extend six miles and a half in circumference, and the suburbs covered the banks of the Crathis for the space of seven miles. It made a long and vigorous resistance against the neighbouring town of Crotona, till it was at last totally reduced by the disciples of Pythagoras, B. C. 308. Sybaris was destroyed no less than five times, and always repaired. Its downfall was owing to the extreme corruption which seized upon the morals of its inhabitants. Their character in this respect was such, that the word Sybarite became proverbial to intinate a man devoted to pleasure. [The city of Thurium was afterwards founded on or near the site of Sybaris. vid. Thurium.] Diod. 12.—Strab. 6.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 24.—Martial. 12, ep. 96.—Plut. in Pelop. &c.—Plin. 3, c. 10.

SYBARITA, an inhabitant of Sybaris. [vid. Sybaris.]

SYENE, now Assuan, a town of Thebais, on the extremities of Egypt. Juvenal the poet was banished there on pretence of commanding a prætorian cohort stationed in the neighbourhood. [It is famous for being the place where the first attempt was made to ascertain the measure of the circumference of the earth by Eratosthenes. In this town, according to Strabo, a well was sunk, which marked the summer-solstice, and the day was known when the style of the sun-dial cast no shade at noon; at that instant the vertical sun darted his rays to the bottom of the well. The observations of the French astronomers place Assuan in Lat. $24^{\circ} 5' 23'$ of north latitude. If this place was formerly situated under the tropic, the position of the earth must be a little altered, and the obliquity of the ecliptic diminished. But we should be aware of the vagueness of observations made by the ancients, which have conferred so much celebrity on these places. The phenomenon of the extinction of the shadow, whether within a deep pit, or round a perpendicular gnomon, is not confined to one exact mathematical position of the sun, but is common to a certain extent of latitude, corresponding to the visible diameter of that luminary, which is more than half a degree. It would be sufficient, therefore, that the northern margin of the sun's disc should reach the zenith of Syene on the day of the summer-solstice, to abolish all lateral shadow of a perpendicular object. Now, in the second century, the obliquity of the ecliptic, reckoned from the observations of Hipparchus, was $23^{\circ} 49' 25''$. If we add the semi-diameter of the sun, which is $15' 57''$, we find for the northern margin $24^{\circ} 5' 22''$, which is within a second of the actual latitude of Syene. At present, when the obliquity of the ecliptic is $23^{\circ} 28'$, the northern limb of the sun comes no nearer the latitude of Syene than $21' 3''$, yet the shadow is scarcely perceptible. We have, therefore, no imperious reason for admitting a greater diminution in the obliquity of the ecliptic than that which is shown by real astronomical observations of the most authentic and exact kind. That of the well of Syene is not among the number of these last, and can give us no assistance in ascertaining the position of the tropic thirty centuries ago, as some respectable men of science seem to have believed.—Nature presents a peculiar spectacle around Syene. Here are the terraces of reddish granite of a particular character, hence called Syenite, a term applied to those rocks which differ from granite in containing particles of hornblende. These mighty terraces, shaped into peaks, cross the bed of the Nile, and over them the river rolls majestically its impetuous and foaming waves. Here are the quarries from which the obelisks and colossal statues of the Egyptian temples were dug. An obelisk, partially formed and still remaining attached to the native rock, bears testimony to the laborious and patient efforts of human art.] Strab. 1 and 2.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 8.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 5, v. 79.—Met. 5, v. 74.—Lucan. 2, v. 587, l. 8, v. 851, l. 10, v. 234.

SYNESIUS, a Cilician, who, with Labinetus of Babylon, concluded a peace between Alyattes, king of Lydia, and Cyaxares, king of Media, while both armies were terrified by a sudden eclipse of the sun, B. C. 585. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

SYENNÉSIS, a satrap of Cilicia, when Cyrus made war against his brother Artaxerxes. He wished to favour both the brothers by sending one of his sons in the army of Cyrus and another to Artaxerxes.

SYLLA, (L. Cornelius,) a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of the courtesan Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and, with the addition of the immense wealth of his mother-in-law, he soon appeared one of the most opulent of the Romans. He first entered the army under the great Marius, whom he accompanied in Numidia in the capacity of questor. He rendered himself conspicuous in military affairs; and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman consul. The rising fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal, as well as of a superior; but the ill language which he might use, rather inflamed than extinguished the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catulus. Some time after he obtained the prætorship, and was appointed by the Roman senate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, against the views and interest of Mithridates king of Pontus. This he easily effected, one battle left him victorious; and before he quitted the plains of Asia, the Roman prætor had the satisfaction to receive in his camp the ambassadors of the king of Parthia, who wished to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtiness, and behaved with such arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, Sarely this man is master of the world, or doomed to be such! At his return to Rome, he was commissioned to finish the war with the Marsi, and when this was successfully ended, he was rewarded with the consulship, in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wished to have the administration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obstinate adversary in Marius, and he attained the summit of his wishes only when he had entered Rome sword in hand. After he had slaughtered all his enemies, set a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually opposed his views, he marched towards Asia, and disregarded the flames of discord which he left behind him unextinguished. Mithridates was already master of the greatest part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coast of Peloponnesus, was delayed by the siege of Athens and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigour, and when he found his money fail, he made no scruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods to bribe his soldiers and render them devoted to his service. His boldness succeeded, the Piræus surrendered; and the conqueror, as if struck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philosophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often disputed, spared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to destruction, and forgave the living for the sake of the dead. Two celebrated battles at Cheronæa and Orchomenos rendered him master of Greece. He crossed the Hellespont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valour and perseverance of his adversary, made proposals of peace; and Sylla, whose interest at home was then decreasing, did not hesitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him master of so much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to dispute with his rival the sovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muræna was left at the head of the Roman forces in Asia, and Sylla hastened to Italy. In the plains of Campania he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the success of his rivals had banished from the capital, and he was soon informed, that if he wished to contend with Marius he must encounter fifteen generals, followed by 25 well-disciplined legions. In these critical circumstances he had recourse to artifice, and while he proposed terms of accommodation to his adversaries he secretly strengthened himself, and saw with pleasure his armies daily increase by the revolt of soldiers whom his bribes or promises had corrupted. Pompey, who afterwards merited the surname of Great, embraced his cause, and marched to his camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and a conqueror. The streets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promised pardon, were suddenly massacred in the circus. The senate, at that time assembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the shrieks of their dying countrymen; and when they inquired into the cause of it, Sylla replied: They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chastised. If this had been the last and most dismal scene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes, each succeeding day exhibited a greater number of slaughtered bodies, and when one of the senators had the boldness to ask the tyrant when he meant to stop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern, answered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his consideration. The slaughter was continued, a list of such as were proscribed was daily stuck in the public streets. The slave was rewarded to bring his master's head, and the son was not ashamed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father for money. No less than 4700 of the most powerful and opulent were slain, and Sylla wished the Romans to forget his cruelties in aspiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity he made new laws, abrogated such as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obstructed. After he had finished whatever the most absolute sovereign may do, from his own will and authority, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power and retired to a solitary retreat at Puteoli, where he spent the rest of his days, if not in literary ease and tranquillity, yet far from the noise of arms, in the midst of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the most base and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleasure still to wallow in voluptuousness, though on the verge of life, and covered with infirmities. His intemperance hastened his end, his blood was corrupted, and an imposthume was bred in his bowels. He at last died in the greatest torments of the lousy disease, about 78 years before Christ, in the 60th year of his age; and it has been observed, that like Marius, on his death-bed, he wished to drown the stings of conscience and remorse by continual intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent; his body was attended by the senate and the vestal virgins, and hymns were sung to celebrate his exploits and to honour his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inscription written by himself, in which he said, the good services he had received from his friends, and the injuries of his enemies had been returned with unexampled usury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, dissimulating, credulous, tyrannical, debauched, and resolute commander. He was revengeful in the highest degree, and the surname of Felix, or the fortunate, which he assumed, showed that he was more indebted to fortune than to valour for the great fame he had acquired. But in the midst of all this, who cannot admire the moderation and philosophy of a man, who, when absolute master of a republic which he has procured by his cruelty and avarice, silently abdicates the sovereign power, challenges a critical examination of his administration, and retires to live securely in the midst of thousands whom he has injured and offended? The Romans were pleased and astonished at his abdication; and when the insolence of a young man had been vented against the dictator, he calmly answered, This usage may perhaps deter another to resign his power to follow my example, if ever he becomes absolute. Sylla has been commended for the patronage he gave to the arts and sciences. He brought to Rome the extensive library of Apellicon, the Peripatetic philosopher, in which were the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and he himself composed 22 books of memoirs concerning himself. Cic. in Verr. &c.—*C. SYLVANUS, a god of the woods. (vid. Silvanus.)

SYLVIA, or ILIA, the mother of Romulus. (vid. Rhea.)

SYLVIVS, a son of Æneas by Lavinia, from whom afterwards all the kings of Alba were called Sylvii. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 763.

SYMMACHUS, [a Roman senator of the fourth century, who became prefect of Rome, pontiff, augur, and proconsul of Africa. He vigorously resisted the changes that were made in the national religion by the triumphs of Christianity, and headed a deputation from the senate to the emperor Valentinian 2d, requesting the re-establishment of priests and vestals, and of the altar of victory. This application was resisted by St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, who composed an answer to the petition of Symmachus, as did also the poet Prudentius. Symmachus lost his cause, and for some reason was banished by Valentinian, or Theodosius, the latter of whom recalled him, and raised him to the consulship, A. D. 391. The petition above mentioned, is preserved in the ten books of Symmachus's epistles still extant. His oratory was of that kind which characterized the decline of Roman literature. "The luxuriancy of Symmachus," says Gibbon, "consists of barren leaves without fruit, and even without flowers. Few facts and few sentiments can be extracted from his verbose correspondence." Of these epistles the best edition is that of Scioppius, Mogunt. 1608, 4to.]

SYMPLEGÆDES, or CYANÆE, two islands or rocks, at the entrance of the Euxine Sea, (vid. Cyanæe.)

SYNCELLUS, [one of the Byzantine historians, who derived his name from his being syncellus, or "constant resident" with Tarassias, patriarch of Constantinople. Syncellus lived in the time of Charlemagne, and began to write his history in 792, but was prevented by death from extending it beyond the times of Maximian and Maximin. It is valuable for the account of the Egyptian dynasties. It was published by Goar, Paris, 1652, fol.]

SYNESIUS, [a native of Cyrene, of noble extraction, who, on his conversion to Christianity, was made bishop of Ptolemais. Several of his writings, and 155 of his epistles are extant. His style is characterized as being lofty and dignified, and inclining to the poetical and rhetorical.] The last edition is in 8vo. Paris, 1605; inferior, however, to the editio princeps by Petavius, fol. Paris, 1612.

SYNNAS, (adis.) or SYNNADE, (plur.) [a town of Phrygia, north-west of the plain of Ipsus. Between this place and Docimæum, which lay to the north-west, were famous marble-quarries, whence a beautiful kind of white marble, with red spots, was obtained. This was held in very high repute by the Romans, and much used in buildings. The Romans named this marble after the town of Synnada, lapis Synnadicus; the inhabitants of the country called it λιθος Δοκιμωτης vel Δοκιμωτης, from Docimæum. Strabo speaks of the high degree of value attached to it, and of slabs and columns of it having been transported to Rome at a vast expense.] Strab. 12.—Claudian, in Entr. 2.—Mart. a. 9, ep. 77.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 5, v. 41.

SYPHAX, a king of the Masæsyli in Libya, who married Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, and forsook the alliance of the Romans to join himself to the interest of his father-in-law, and of Carthage. [Encamping his army apart from that of Asdrubal, both camps were in the night surprised and burnt by Scipio. Afterwards, in a general engagement, the united Carthaginian and Numidian armies were defeated. Syphax, upon this, hastened back to his own country, but, being pursued by Lælius and Masinissa, he, together with his son Vermina, was taken prisoner, and brought back to Scipio.] The conqueror carried him to Rome, where he adorned his triumph. Syphax died in prison, 201 years before Christ, and his possessions were given to Masinissa. According to some, the descendants of Syphax reigned for some time over a part of Numidia, and continued to make opposition to the Romans. Liv. 24, &c.—Plut. in Scip.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Polyb.—Ital. 16, v. 171 and 113.—*Ovid. SYRACOSIA, festivals at Syracuse, celebrated during ten days, in which women were busily employed in offering sacrifices. — Another, yearly observed near the lake of Syracuse, where, as they supposed, Pluto had disappeared with Proserpine.

SYRACUSÆ, a celebrated city of Sicily, founded about 732 years before the Christian era, by Archias a Corinthian, and one of the Heraclidæ. In its flourishing state it extended 22½ English miles in circumference, and was divided into 4 districts, Ortygia, Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis, to which some add a fifth division, Epipolæ, a district little inhabited. These were themselves separate cities. [The whole was encompassed by a triple wall, so flanked with towers and castles at proper distances, as to be almost impregnable.] Syracuse had two capacious harbours, separated from one another by the island of Ortygia. The greatest harbour was above 5000 paces in circumference, and its entrance 500 paces wide. The people of Syracuse were very opulent and powerful, and though subject to tyrants, they were masters of vast possessions and dependent states. The city of Syracuse was well built, its houses were stately and magnificent; and it has been said, that it produced the best and most excellent of men when they were virtuous, but the most wicked and depraved when addicted to vicious pursuits. The women of Syracuse were not permitted to adorn themselves with gold, or wear costly garments, except such as prostituted themselves. Syracuse gave birth to Theocritus and Archimedes. It was under different governments; and after being freed from the tyranny of Thrasylbus, B. C. 446, it enjoyed security for 61 years, till the usurpation of the Dionysii, who were expelled by Timoleon, B. C. 343.

In the age of the elder Dionysius, an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and 400 ships were kept in constant pay. It fell into the hands of the Romans, under Marcellus, after a siege of three years, B. C. 212. [Of the four ancient quarters of Syracuse, Ortygia alone is now remaining; it is about two miles round, and supposed to contain about 17,000 inhabitants. There are some remains, however, still visible of the ancient Syracuse, in the ruins of porticoes, temples, and palaces. The famous fountain of Arethusa rose in the island of Ortygia, but its spring is now dried up.] Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 52 and 53.—Strab. 1 and 3.—*C. SYRIA, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries are not accurately ascertained by the ancients. Syria, generally speaking, was bounded on the east by the Euphrates [and a small portion of Arabia,] north by Mount Taurus, west by the Mediterranean, and south by Egypt and Arabia Petraea. It was divided into several districts and provinces, among which were Phœnicia, Seleucis, Judea or Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria. [Syria is called in Scripture Aram, and the inhabitants Aramæans, a name derived from Aram the fifth son of Shem, the father of the Syrians. Mesopotamia is also called Aram in the sacred text, but the appellation Naharim, i. e. "between the rivers," is always added for distinction sake to the latter. The name which has been transmitted to us by the Greeks is a corruption or abridgment of Assyria, which was first adopted by the Ionians who frequented these coasts after the Assyrians of Nineveh had reduced this country to be a province of their empire about 750 B. C. The Greeks, however, were not unacquainted with the term Aramæans, but they gave it a wide appellation, making it comprehend the Syrians, the inhabitants of Mesopotamia, the Assyrians, and the White Syrians or Leuco-Syrii, as far as Pontus, because they saw that all these nations used a common language, the same customs, and the same religious faith.] Syria was subjected to the monarchs of Persia; but after the death of Alexander the Great, Seleucus, surnamed Nicator, who had received this province as his lot in the division of the Macedonian dominions, raised it into an empire, known in history by the name of the kingdom of Syria or Babylon, B. C. 312. Seleucus died after a reign of 32 years, and his successors, surnamed the Seleucida, ascended the throne in the following order; Antiochus, surnamed Soter, 280 B. C.; Antiochus Theos, 261; Seleucus Callinicus, 246; Seleucus Ceraunus, 226; Antiochus the Great, 223; Seleucus Philopator, 187; Antiochus Epiphanes, 175; Antiochus Eupator, 164; Demetrius Soter, 162; Alex. Balas, 150; Demetrius Nicator, 146; Antiochus the Sixth, 144; Diodotus Tryphon, 143; Antiochus Sidetes, 139; Demetrius Nicator restored, 130; Alexander Zebina, 127, who was dethroned by Antiochus Grypus, 123; Antiochus Cyzicenus, 112, who takes part of Syria, which he calls Coeslyria; Philip and Demetrius Eucerus, 93, and in Coeslyria, Antiochus Pius; Aretas was king of Coeslyria. 85; Tigranes, king of Armenia, 83; and Antiochus Asiaticus, 69, who was dethroned by Pompey, B. C. 65; in consequence of which Syria became a Roman province. Herodot. 2, 3 and 7.—Apollon. 1. Arg.—Strab. 12 and 16.—C. Nep. in Dat.—Mela. 1. c. 2.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 6.—*Dionys. SYRIACUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean Sea which is on the coast of Phœnicia and Syria.

SYRINX, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the river Ladoa. Pan became enamoured of her, and attempted to offer her violence; but Syrinx escaped, and at her own request was changed by the gods into a reed called Syrinx by the Greeks. The god made himself a pipe with the reeds into which his favourite nymph had been changed. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 691.—Martial. 9, ep. 63.

SYROPHœNIX, the name of an inhabitant of the maritime coast of Syria. Juv. 8.

SYROS, one of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea, at the [west] of Delos, about 20 miles in circumference, very fruitful in wine and corn of all sorts. The inhabitants lived to a great old age, because the air was wholesome. Hom. Od. 15, v. 504.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

SYRTES, [two gulfs on the northern coast of Africa, one called Syrtis Minor, on the coast of Byzacium, and now the Gulf of Cabes; the other called Syrtis Major, on the coast of Cyrenaica, now the Gulf of Sidra. The former is supposed to derive its modern name from the city of Tacape, which was at the head of it, that of the latter is a corruption from the ancient name Syrtis. The term Syrtis, if it has not a more ancient oriental etymology, seems to be derived from the Greek συρην, trahere, and has reference to the effect of the winds and waves upon the quicksands in these two gulfs. The Syrtis Minor is about 45 geographical miles in breadth, and runs up into the continent about 75 miles. It is still an object of apprehension to sailors, in consequence of the variations and uncertainties of the tides on a flat and shelvy coast. The Syrtis Major is about 180 geographical miles between the two capes, and penetrates 100 miles into the land.] The word has been used to denote any part of the sea of which the navigation was attended with danger either from whirlpools or hidden rocks. Mela, 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 7.—*Virg. TABELLARIÆ LEGES, [laws passed at various times for the purpose of enabling the Roman commons to vote by ballot, and no longer vivâ voce. The object of these laws was to diminish the power of the nobility. Voting by ballot was allowed by the Gabinian law A. U. C. 614, in conferring honours: two years after, at all trials except for treason, by the Cassian law: in passing laws, by the Papirian law, A. U. C. 622; and lastly, in trials for treason, also by the Cœlian law, A. U. C. 630.]

TABOR, [a mountain of Gallilee, west of Tiberias, and south-east of Dio-Cæsarea. It was called Itabyrius by the Greeks. Josephus makes it 30 furlongs in height and 26 in compass. It is an insulated mountain, (whence its name, Tabor in Hebrew signifying separate), and is situate in the plain of Esdraelon, having a level and extensive area at the summit, very fertile and pleasant.

This plain is of an oblong figure, like the mountain itself, and three thousand paces in circuit. On this plain there once stood a city, probably the same with the city Tabor in the tribe of Zabulon, mentioned in 1 Chron. 5, c. 77. There is a small height on the eastern side, which is the place, where, according to tradition, our Lord was transfigured. St. Helena built a handsome church on this spot in memory of that event, but it is now in ruins. Some writers maintain, however, that the scene of the transfiguration was upon Mount Panium, near Cæsarea Philippi.]

TACAPE, a town of Africa, [at the head of the Syrtis Minor. It is now Cabes; near it were some medicinal waters, called Aque Tacapinæ, now El-Hamma.]

TACARINÆS, a Numidian who commanded an army against the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly served in the Roman legions, but in the character of an enemy, he displayed the most inveterate hatred against his benefactor. After he had severally defeated the officers of Tiberius, he was at last routed and killed in the field of battle, fighting with uncommon fury, by Dolabella. Tacit. Ann. 2, &c.

TACHOS, or TACHUS, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, against whom he sustained a long war. He was assisted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Agesilaus, king of Lacedæmon, proved fatal to him. Chabrias, the Athenian, had been intrusted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Agesilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian disregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus, who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to save his life by flight. Some observe that Agesilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himself upon Tachus, who had insolently ridiculed his short and deformed stature. The expectations of Tachus had been raised by the fame of Agesilaus; but when he saw the lame monarch, he repeated on the occasion the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouse, upon which Agesilaus replied with asperity, though he called him a mouse yet he soon should find him to be a lion. C. Nep. in Agnes.

TACĪTA, a goddess who presided over silence. Numa, as some say, paid particular veneration to this divinity.

TACĪTUS, (C. Cornelius,) a celebrated Latin historian, born towards the beginning of the reign of Nero. [The exact year cannot be ascertained, but as Pliny the younger informs us that he and Tacitus were nearly of the same age, it is supposed that Tacitus was born A. U. C. 809 or 810, about the 6th year of Nero's reign. The place of his nativity is no where mentioned.] His father was a Roman knight, who had been appointed governor of Belgic Gaul. The native genius, and the rising talents of Tacitus, were beheld with rapture by the emperor Vespasian, and as he wished to protect and patronize merit, he raised the young historian to places of trust and honour. The succeeding emperors were no less partial to Tacitus, and Domitian seemed to forget his cruelties, when virtue and innocence claimed his patronage. [Tacitus himself furnishes a solution of this strange conduct on the part of Domitian. Agricola, he tells us, had the address to restrain the headlong violence of the tyrant by his prudence and moderation. Tacitus imitated this line of conduct, and instead of giving umbrage to the prince and provoking the tools of power, he was content to display his eloquence at the bar. Tacitus had a talent for poetry, and his verses most probably served to ingratiate him with the tyrant who affected to be a votary of the muses. In addition to this he was the author of a book of apophthegms called Facetia, that very amusement could not fail to prove successful in gaining for him the notice of Domitian. By this emperor Tacitus was made prætor, A. D. 83; he was also appointed one of the college of Quindecimviri. In A. D. 78, he married the daughter of Julius Agricola. On the death of his father-in-law in A. D. 93, he quitted Rome, but returned to it in the year 97 when Nerva was on the throne. This prince named him successor in the consulship to Virginius Rufus, who had just died. Subsequently, however, he quitted public affairs, and gave himself up in private to his historical compositions. The period of his death is not known.] The friendly intercourse of Pliny and Tacitus has often been admired, and many have observed, that the familiarity of these two great men arose from similar principles, and a perfect conformity of manners and opinions. Yet Tacitus was as much the friend of a republican government as Pliny was an admirer of the imperial power, and of the short-lived virtues of his patron Trajan. Pliny gained the hearts of his adherents by affability, and all the elegant graces which became the courtier and the favourite, while Tacitus conciliated the esteem of the world by his virtuous conduct, which prudence and love of honour ever guided. The friendship of Tacitus and of Pliny almost became proverbial, and one was scarce mentioned without the other, as the following instance may indicate. At the exhibition of the spectacles in the circus, Tacitus had a long conversation on different subjects with a Roman knight with whom he was unacquainted; and when the knight asked him whether he was a native of Italy, the historian told him that he was not unknown to him, and that for their distant acquaintance he was indebted to literature. Then you are, replied the knight, either Tacitus or Pliny. The time of Tacitus was not employed in trivial pursuits, the orator might have been now forgotten if the historian had not flourished. Tacitus wrote a treatise on the manners of the Germans, a composition admired for the fidelity and exactness with which it is executed, though some have declared that the historian delineated manners and customs with which he was not acquainted, and which never existed. [In this treatise but little reliance can be placed on the geographical notices of Tacitus, which are very defective. His remarks on the manners, usages, and political institutions of this people are, on the other hand, peculiarly valuable. The historian is supposed by the best critics to have derived his principal information relative to the Germans from persons who had served against them, and in particular from Virginius Rufus, who, as we learn from the letters of Pliny, was the friend of Tacitus. The great work also of the elder Pliny on Germany, now lost, must have been an important aid. As to the object of the historian in composing this work, some have even gone so far as to suppose that his sole intention was to satirize the corrupt morals of his contemporaries by holding forth to view an ideal and highly coloured picture of barbarian virtue. According to these same writers his object was to bring back his countrymen to their ancient simplicity of manners, and thus oppose an effectual barrier to those enemies which menaced the safety of their descendants. But a perusal of the work in question destroys all this fanciful hypothesis. The analogy between many of the rude manners of the early Germans and those of the aborigines of our own country, at once stamps the work with the seal of truth. What if Tacitus dwells with a certain predilection upon the simple manners of Germany? it surely is natural in one who had become disgusted with the excesses of Italy. We are not to suppose, however, that this work of Tacitus is free from errors. The very manner in which he acquired his information on this subject must have led to misconceptions and mistakes. Religious prejudices also served occasionally to mislead the historian, who beheld the traces of Greek and Roman mythology even in the north.] His life of Cn. Julius Agricola, whose daughter he had married, is celebrated for its purity, elegance, and the many excellent instructions and important truths which it relates. [In this work we know not which most to admire, the noble and amiable character of Agricola, or the truth, the sensibility, and the calm and manly tone of the biography. The misfortunes of the age had impressed on the style of Tacitus a character of melancholy, which gives to the work a sombre and enchanting air. The friendship which he felt for Agricola never leads Tacitus to violate the claims of historical accuracy; while at the same time he does not attempt to conceal his indignation at the policy of the Roman government, of which Agrippa himself was sometimes the instrument. The work is a model of biography.] His history of the Roman emperors is imperfect; of the 28 years of which it treated, that is from the 69th to the 96th year of the Christian era, nothing remains but the year 69 and part of the 70th. [The history of Tacitus began with the accession of Galba, and extended to the death of Domitian. It embraced consequently a period of 29 years. He had proposed to himself to add the history of Nerva and Trajan; there is reason, however, to think that Tacitus never executed this design. The number of books into which the history was divided is unknown; it must have been considerable, since the first four books and the commencement of the fifth, which are all that remains to us, embrace merely the period of little more than one year.] His annals were the most extensive and complete of his works. [The annals of Tacitus were in sixteen books. They embraced the history of the events which transpired from the death of Augustus to that of Nero, as well as those which preceded the epoch which formed the subject of the History. They must not, however, be regarded as forming the first part of the History, since they constitute a separate work, and are composed on a different plan, more suitable to the recital of events of which the historian had not been an eye-witness. There remain to us of this work, the first four books, a part of the fifth, and from the eleventh to the fourteenth inclusive, excepting the end of the fourteenth. The portion that we have of the annals, contains the reign of Tiberius, the close of that of Claudius, and almost the whole of Nero's. We want the reigns of Caligula and the beginning of that of Claudius.] The history of the reign of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius, and Nero, was treated with accuracy and attention, yet we are to lament the loss of the history of the reign of Caius, and the beginning of that of Claudius. Tacitus had reserved for his old age the history of the reign of Nerva and Trajan, and he also proposed to give to the world an account of the interesting administration of Augustus; but these important subjects never employed the pen of the historian. The style of Tacitus has always been admired for peculiar beauties; the thoughts are great; there is sublimity, force, weight and energy; every thing is treated with precision and dignity; yet many have called him obscure, because he was fond of expressing his ideas in few words. This was the fruit of experience and judgment, the history appears copious and diffusive, while the annals, which were written in his old age, are less flowing as to style, more concise, and more heavily laboured. [The conciseness of Tacitus appears to have been modelled after that of Sallust. He is rich in ideas, and frequently his language does not suffice for the expression of all that he thinks. His phrases oftentimes imply far more than they express. Obscurity is the natural result of all this; and yet the language of Tacitus is deserving of very close attention. Frequently this very obscurity is the offspring of design: the historian does not, from motives of policy, express himself fully, but leaves much to the sagacity of the reader.] His Latin is remarkable for being pure and classical; and though a writer in the decline of the Roman empire, he has not used obsolete words, antiquated phrases, or barbarous expressions; but with him every thing is sanctioned by the authority of the writers of the Augustan age. ["Who," exclaims Muretus, "are we moderns, even if all, who have acquired great skill in the Latin language, were assembled in a body; who are we that presume to pronounce against an author (Tacitus,) who, when the Roman language still flourished in all its splendour, (and it flourished to the time of Hadrian,) was deemed the most eloquent orator of his time? When we reflect on the number of ancient authors whose works have been destroyed, which of us can pretend to say that the words which appear new in Tacitus were not known and used by the ancients? and yet, at the distance of ages, when the productions of genius have been well nigh extinguished, we of this day take upon us a decisive tone, to condemn the most celebrated writers, whose cooks and mule-drivers understood the Latin language, and spoke it better than the most confident scholar of the present age." To these remarks of Muretus a regard for truth compels us to say, that if barbarous Latin was spoken in the palace of Augustus, it would be nothing very surprising for unclassical Latin to appear in the pages of Tacitus.] In his biographical sketches he displays an uncommon knowledge of human nature, he paints every scene with a masterly hand, and gives each object its proper size and becoming colours. Affairs of importance are treated with dignity, the secret causes of events and revolutions are investigated from their primeval source, and the historian every where shows his reader that he was a friend of public liberty and national independence, a lover of truth, and of the general good and welfare of mankind, and an inveterate enemy to oppression and to a tyrannical government. The history of the reign of Tiberius is his master-piece: the deep policy, the dissimulation and various intrigues of this celebrated prince, are painted with all the fidelity of the historian; and Tacitus boasted in saying that he neither would flatter the follies, or maliciously or partially represent the extravagance of the several characters he delineated. Candour and impartiality were his standard, and his claim to these essential qualifications of an historian have never been disputed. It is said that the emperor Tacitus, who boasted in being one of the descendants of the historian, ordered the works of his ancestor to be placed in all public libraries, and directed that copies well ascertained for accuracy and exactness, should be written every ten years, at the public expense, that so great and so valuable a work might not be lost. [The emperor Tacitus reigned only six or seven months, and his order respecting the historian was most probably neglected after his death. The manuscripts of the annals had become so scarce, that when Vindelinius of Spires published his edition in 1468 or 1469, the last books of the work had alone been found. Leo 10th promised a pecuniary recompense and indulgences to any one who should find the lost portions of the work. One of his agents, Angelo Archomboldi, discovered in the monastery of Corvey in Westphalia, a manuscript which had belonged to Anschaire, a bishop, and the founder of the convent, which contained the first five books of the annals, the last book imperfect. Beraldus published them at Rome in 1515, by order of the pope.] Some ecclesiastical writers have exclaimed against Tacitus for the partial manner in which he speaks of the Jews and the Christians; but it should be remembered, that he spoke the language of the Romans, and that the peculiarities of the Christians could not but draw upon them the odium and the ridicule of the Pagans, and the imputation of superstition. [There has come down to us, a dialogue entitled "De claris oratoribus, sive de causis corruptæ eloquentiæ." The manuscripts and old editions name Tacitus as the author of this production; a great number of commentators, however, ascribe it to Quintilian, and some to Pliny the younger. They who argue from the language of manuscripts, allege in their favour Pomponius Sabianus, a grammarian who states that Tacitus had given to the works of Mæcenæ the epithet of calamistri. Now, the passage to which the grammarian alludes is actually found in the 26th chapter of the dialogue under consideration. The author of the dialogue, moreover, informs us in the first chapter, that he was a very young man (juvenis admodum) when he wrote it, or at least, at the period when he supposes it to have been held in his presence. This point of time is clearly determined in the 17th chapter; it was the sixth year of the reign of Vespasian, A. D. 75. Tacitus at this period would be about sixteen years of age. From what has been said then it will be perceived that, as far as chronology is concerned, nothing prevents our regarding Tacitus as the author of the dialogue in question. It is true we find a marked difference between the style of the writer of this dialogue and that of the historian: but would not the intervening period of forty years sufficiently account for this discrepancy, and the language of the man be different from the tone of early youth? Might not, too, the same writer have varied his style in order to adapt it to different subjects? Ought he not to assimilate his style to the various characters who bear a part in the dialogue? Iqueduced by these and other reasons, Pithou, Dodwell, Schulze, and many others, have given their opinion in favour of our adhering to the titles of the manuscripts, and have ascribed the dialogue to Tacitus. Rhenanus was the first who entertained doubts respecting the claim of Tacitus to the authorship of this production, and since his time Dousa, Stephens, Freinshemius, and others no less celebrated, have contended that Quintilian, not Tacitus, must be regarded as the true writer of the work. They place great reliance on two passages of Quintilian, where that writer says expressly that he had composed a separate treatise on the causes of the corruption of eloquence (Inst. Or. 6, præm. et. 8, c. 6), as well as on many other passages in which this same work is cited, without the author's indicating the title. How can we suppose, it is asked, that either Tacitus or Pliny would be inclined to treat of a subject which had already been discussed by Quintilian? These same critics observe, moreover, that there appears to be a great analogy not only between the matters treated of in this dialogue, and those which form the subject of Quintilian's writings, but also between his style and that of the work in question. But it may be replied in the first place, that at the time when the dialogue was written, Quintilian was already thirty-three years of age, a period of life to which the expression juvenis admodum can with no propriety whatever be made to apply. In the next place, the argument deduced from analogy of style is not the most conclusive, since those critics who assign the work to Pliny or Tacitus, adduce a similar argument in support of their claims. On the other hand, the argument which has been drawn from identity of title, would be a very strong one, if it were not a fact that the second title, which is found in modern editions, "De causis corruptæ eloquentiæ," owes its existence entirely to Lipsius, who thought fit to add this second title which he had found in Quintilian. All the manuscripts, and the early editions, merely have the title "De claris oratoribus," or else this one, "Dialogus an sui sæculi oratores et quare concedant." Another circumstance very much against the idea of Quintilian's being the author of the piece, is the fact of his more than once referring the reader to his other work for matters of which the dialogue we are considering makes not the slightest mention; such, for example, are the hyperbole, and exaggeration, of which he speaks in the 3d book, ch. 3 and 6. The latest editor of Quintilian, Spalding, has carefully collected all these passages, which, in his opinion, show that Quintilian was not the author of the dialogue.] Among the many excellent editions of Tacitus, these may pass for the best; that of Rome, fol. 1515; that in 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1673; that in Usum Delphini, 4 vols. 4to. Paris, 1682; that of Lips. 2 vols. 8vo. 1714; of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to. 1721; that of Brotier, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1776; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1777; Barbou's, 3 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1760; [and that of Oberlinus, Lips. 1801, 2 vols. 8vo. in 4 parts; reprinted at Oxford, in 1813, in 4 vols.]—M. Claudius, a Roman, chosen emperor by the senate after the death of Aurelian. He would have refused this important and dangerous office, but the pressing solicitations of the senate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age he complied with the wishes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his administration was very popular, the good of the people was his care, and, as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He abolished the several brothels which under the preceding reigns had filled Rome with licentiousness and obscenity; and, by ordering all the public baths to be shut at sunset, he prevented the commission of many irregularities which the darkness of the night had hitherto sanctioned. The senators under Tacitus seemed to have recovered their ancient dignity and long-lost privileges. They were not only the counsellors of the emperor, but they even seemed to be his masters; and when Florianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refused the consulship, the emperor said, that the senate no doubt, could fix upon a more deserving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans, and during a short reign of about six months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Asia, but he prepared to make war against the Persians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia, as he was on his expedition, of a violent distemper, or, according to some, he was destroyed by the secret dagger of an assassin, on the 13th of April, in the 276th year of the Christian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning, and it has been observed, that he never passed a day without consecrating some part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accused of superstition, and authors have recorded, that he never studied on the second day of each month, a day which he deemed inauspicious and unlucky. Tacit. vitâ.—Zozim.

TADER, a river of Spain, near New Carthage.

TÆNÆRUS, a promontory of Laconia. [It is now called Cape Matapan, which is a modern Greek corruption from the ancient ματαπον, "a front," the promontory boldly projecting into the Mediterranean.] There was there a large and deep cavern, whence issued a black and unwholesome vapour, from which circumstance the poets have imagined that it was one of the entrances of hell, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus from the infernal regions. This fabulous tradition arose, according to Pausanias, from the continual resort of a large serpent near the cavern of Tænarus, whose bite was mortal. This serpent, as the geographer observes, was at last killed by Hercules, and carried to Eurystheus. [There was a temple on the promontory, sacred to Neptune, and which was accounted an inviolable asylum. It seems to have been a species of cavern. On the promontory also was a statue of Arion seated on a dolphin. About 40 stadia from the promontory stood the city of Tænarum, afterwards called Cæne or Cænopolis.] Both the town and the promontory received their name from Tænarus, a son of Neptune, and there were festivals celebrated here, called Tænaria, in honour of Neptune. This promontory was famous for a beautiful species of green marble found in its quarries. *Homer. Hymn. in Apoll. 413.—Paus. 3, c. 14.—Lucan. 6, v. 648.—Ovid. It pursues a course nearly due west, verging slightly to the south, and traverses the territories of the Celtiberi, Carpetani, Vettones, and Lusitani, until it reaches the Atlantic Ocean. The Tagus is the largest river in Spain, though Strabo considers the Minus as such, an evident error.] The sands of this stream produced grains of gold, and, according to Mela, precious stones.

It is now called by the Portuguese, the Tajo, though its ancient name still remains in general use.] The course is 450 miles, during only 100 of which it is navigable, on account of the rocks, rapids, and shallows. TALASIU. [vid. Thalasius.]

TALTHYBIUS, a herald in the Grecian camp during the Trojan war, the particular minister and friend of Agamemnon. He brought away Briseis from the tent of Achilles by order of his master. Talthybius died at Ægium in Achaia. Homer. Il. 1, v. 320, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 23.

TALUS, a youth, son of the sister of Dædalus, who invented the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle became jealous of his growing fame, and murdered him privately; or, according to others, he threw him down from the citadel of Athens. Talus was changed into a partridge by the gods. He is also called Calus, Acalus, Perdax, and Taliris. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 1, c. 21.—Ovid. Met. 8.—A son of Ctes, the founder of the Cretan nation. Paus. 8, c. 53.

[TAMARUS, a river of Britain, now the Tamar; the Tamari ostia is Plymouth sound.]

TAMASĒA, a beautiful plain of Cyprus, sacred to the goddess of beauty. It was in this place that Venus gathered the golden apples with which Hippomanes was enabled to overtake Atalanta. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 644.—Plin. 5.—Strab. 14.

TAMĒSIS, a river of Britain, now the Thames. [Cæsar is generally supposed to have crossed this river at Coway Stakes, 7 or 8 miles above Kingston; but Horsely seems to be of opinion that he forded it near that town.] Cæs. G. 5, c. 11.

TAMOS, a native of Memphis, made governor of Ionia, by young Cyrus. After the death of Cyrus, Tamos fled into Egypt, where he was murdered on account of his immense treasures. Diod. 14.—A promontory of India near the Ganges.

TANĀGRA, a town of Bœotia, [situate on an eminence at some distance inland from the mouth of the Asopus, but near the northern bank of that river.] It was founded by Pœmandros, a son of Chæresilaus, the son of Jasius, who married Tanagra, the daughter of Æolus, or, according to some, of the Asopus. Corinna was a native of Tanagra. [Her tomb stood in the most conspicuous part of the city.] Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, c. 20 and 23.—Ælian. V. H. 13, v. 25.

TANĀGRUS, or TANĀGER, now Negro, a river of Lucania in Italy, remarkable for its cascades, and the beautiful meanders of its streams through a fine picturesque country. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.

TANAIS, [now the Don, a large river of Europe, rising, according to Herodotus, in the territory of the Thyssagetes; from a large lake, and falling into the Palus Mæotis. Herodotus appears to have confounded the Tanais in the upper part of its course with the Rha, or Wolga. Of the course of the latter, and its falling into the Caspian, he appears to have known nothing. The Tanais rises in the Valdai hills, in the government of Tula, and is about 800 miles in length. This river separated in ancient times European and Asiatic Sarmatia. In voyages written more than half a century ago, it is called the Tane; at the same time communicating this name to the Palus Mæotis; the modern name Don is only a corrupt abbreviation of the ancient appellation. A city named Tanais, situate at its mouth, and which was the emporium of the commerce of the country, is celebrated in tradition by the Slavons, under the name of Aas-grad, or the city of Aas, and it is remarkable to find the name of Asof subsisting on the same site. It may moreover be remarked, that this name contributes to compose that of Tanais, formed of two members, the first of which expresses the actual name of the river. The Greeks in the age of Alexander confounded the Tanais with the Iaxartes. vid. Iaxartes.] A town at its mouth bore the same name. Mela, 1, c. 19.—Strab. 11 and 16.—Curt. 6, c. 2.—Lucan. 3, 8, &c.—A deity among the Persians and Armenians who patronized slaves; supposed to be the same as Venus. The daughters of the noblest of the Persians and Armenians prostituted themselves in honour of this deity and were received with greater regard and affection by their suitors. Artaxerxes, the son of Darius, was the first who raised statues to Tanais in the different provinces of his empire, and taught his subjects to pay her divine honours. Curt. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 11.

TANĀQUIL, called also Caia Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin the fifth king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where she married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he assumed after he had come to Rome, at the representation of his wife, whose knowledge of augury promised him something uncommon. Her expectations were not frustrated; her husband was raised to the throne, and she shared with him the honours of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin, Tanaquil raised her son-in-law Servius Tullius to the throne, and ensured him the succession. She distinguished herself by her liberality; and the Romans in succeeding ages had such a veneration for her character, that the embroidery she had made, her girdle, as also the robe of her son-in-law, which she had worked with her own hands, were preserved with the greatest sanctity. Juvenal bestows the appellation of Tanaquil on all such women as were imperious, and had the command of their husbands. Liv. 1, c. 34, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Flor. 1, c. 5 and 8.—Ital. 13, v. 813.

TANĒTUM, a town of Italy, now Toneda, in the duchy of Modena.

TANIS, [a city of Egypt at the entrance of, and giving name to, the Tanitic mouth of the Nile, between the Mendesian and Pelusiac. This city is the Zoan of the Scriptures, and its remains are still called San. The Ostium Taniticum is now the Eummè Fareggè mouth.]

TANTALIDES, a patronymic applied to the descendants of Tantalus, such as Niobe, Hermione, &c.—Agamemnon and Menelaus, as grandson of Tantalus, are called Tantalide fratres. Ovid. Heroid. 8, v. 45 and 122.

TANTALUS, a king of Lydia, son of Jupiter, by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c., by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by some Euryanassa. Tantalus is represented by the poets as punished in hell with an insatiable thirst, and placed up to the chin in the midst of a pool of water, which, however, flows away as soon as he attempts to taste it. There hangs also above his head, a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruits; which, as soon as he attempts to seize, is carried away from his reach by a sudden blast of wind. According to some mythologists, his punishment is to sit under a huge stone hung at some distance over his head, and, as it seems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never-ceasing fears. The causes of this eternal punishment are variously explained. Some declare that it was inflicted upon him because he stole a favourite dog, which Jupiter had intrusted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others say that he stole away the nectar and ambrosia from the tables of the gods when he was admitted into the assemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others support, that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his son Pelops, and in serving his limbs as food before the gods, whose divinity and power he wished to try, when they had stopped at his house as they passed over Phrygia. There were also others who impute it to his lasciviousness in carrying away Ganymedes to gratify the most unnatural of passions. Pindar. Olymp. 1.—Homer. Od. 11, v. 581.—*Cic. TANUSIUS GEMINUS, a Latin historian intimate with Cicero. Seneca. 93.—Suet. Cæs. 9.

TAPHIÆ, islands in the Ionian Sea, between Acarnania and Leucadia. They were also called Teleboides. They received these names from Taphius and Telebous, the sons of Neptune, who reigned there. The Taphians made war against Electryon king of Argos, and killed all his sons; upon which the monarch promised his kingdom and his daughter in marriage to whoever could avenge the death of his children upon the Taphians. Amphictryon did it with success, and obtained the promised reward. The Taphians were expert sailors, but too fond of plunder and piratical excursions. Homer.

Od. 1, v. 181 and 419, l. 15, v. 426.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

TAPHIUS, a son of Neptune by Hippothoe, the daughter of Nestor. He was king of the Taphiæ, to which he gave his name. Strab. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.

TAPHIUS, or TAPHIASSUS, a mountain of Locris on the confines of Ætolia.

TAPHIUSA, a place near Leucas, where a stone is found called Taphiusius. Plin. 36, c. 21.

TAPHRÆ, a town on the Isthmus of the Taurica Chersonesus, now Precep. [The ancient name is derived from ταφρος, a ditch or trench, one having been cut close to the town to defend the entrance into the Chersonese.] Mela. 2, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

TAPHROS, the strait between Corsica and Sardinia, now Bonifacio.

TAPROBANE, [an island in the Indian Ocean, now called Ceylon. The Greeks first learnt the existence of this island after the expedition of Alexander, when ambassadors were sent by them to the court of Palimbothra. The account then received was amplified so much, that this island was deemed the commencement of another world, inhabited by Antichthones, or men in a position opposite to those in the known hemisphere. Ptolemy, better informed, makes it an island; five times greater, however, than it really is. Strabo speaks of it as though it lay off the hither coast of India, looking towards the continent of Africa. The name of Salice, which we learn from Ptolemy to have been the native denomination of the island, is preserved in that of Selen-dine, compounded of the proper name Selen and the appellative for an island in the Indian language, and it is apparent that the name of Ceylan or Ceylon, according to the European usage, is only an alteration in orthography. Ptolemy speaks of it as a very fertile island, and mentions, as its produce, rice, honey (or rather perhaps sugar), ginger, and also precious stones, with all sorts of metals; he speaks too of its elephants and tigers. It is surprising, however, that neither Ptolemy nor those who preceded him, say any thing of the cinnamon which now forms the chief produce of the island. The ancients could not be ignorant of the nature of this article, especially as they called a portion of the eastern coast of Africa by the name of Regio Cinnamonifera.] Ptol. 6.—Strab. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 3, el. 5, v. 80.

TAPSUS, a town of Africa. [vid. Thapsus.] Sil. It. 3.—A small and lowly situated peninsula on the eastern coast of Sicily. [Its name has reference to its low situation; from θαπρω, sepelio. It lay off Hybla. The neck of land connecting it with the main island of Sicily was so low that Servius calls the promontory itself an island; and it is even now styled Isola delli Manghisi.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.

TARAS, a son of Neptune, who built Tarantum as some suppose.

TARASCO, a town of Gaul, now Tarascou in Provence.

TARAXIPPUS, a deity worshipped at Elis. His statue was placed near the race-ground, and his protection was implored, that no harm might happen to the horses during the games. Paus. 6, c. 20, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 2

TARBELLI, a people of Gaul, at the foot of the Pyrenees, which from thence are sometimes called Tarbella. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 13.—Lucan. 4, v. 121—Cæs. G. 3, c. 27.

TARENTUM, TARENTUS or TARAS, a town of Calabria, situate on a bay of the same name, near the mouth of the river Galesus. [It was founded, according to some, by a Cretan colony before the Trojan war. In the 21st Olympiad a powerful body of emigrant arrived under Phalanthus from Laconia, so that is seemed to be re-founded. This new colony established themselves upon an aristocratical plan, enlarged the fortifications of the city, and formed it into a near resemblance of Sparta. Most of the nobles having subsequently perished in a war with the Iapyges, democracy was introduced. The favourable situation of the place contributed to its rapid prosperity. Placed in the centre as it were, it obtained the whole commerce of the Adriatic, Ionian, and Tyrrhenian seas. The adjacent country was fertile in grain and fruit, the pastures were excellent, the flocks afforded a very fine wool. It is not surprising that under such circumstances Tarentum should become a wealthy, and in consequence of its wealth, a luxurious, city.] Long independent, it maintained its superiority over 13 tributary cities; and could once arm 100,000 foot and 3,000 horse. The people of Tarentum were very indolent, and as they were easily supplied with all necessaries as well as luxuries from Greece, they gave themselves up to voluptuousness, so that the delights of Tarentum became proverbial. The war which they supported against the Romans, with the assistance of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and which has been called the Tarentine war, is greatly celebrated in history. This war, which had been undertaken B. C. 281, by the Romans to punish the Tarentines for an unprovoked attack on some of their galleys, was terminated after ten years; 20,000 prisoners were taken, and Tarentum became subject to Rome. The government of Tarentum was democratical; there were, however, some monarchs who reigned there. It was for some time the residence of Pythagoras, who inspired the citizens with the love of virtue, and rendered them superior to their neighbours in the cabinet as well as in the field of battle. The large, beautiful, and capacious harbour of Tarentum is greatly commended by ancient historians. Tarentum, now called Taranto, is inhabited by about 18,000 souls, who still maintain the character of their forefathers in idleness and effeminacy, and live chiefly by fishing. Flor. 1, c. 18.—*Val. TARICHEUM, [a strong city of Palestine, south of Tiberias, and lying at the southern extremity of the lake of Gennesareth, or Sea of Tiberias. Its situation was well adapted for fisheries, and from thence was well adapted fish, which was carried on the coast of Egypt bore this name from thence.] Cic. ad Div. 12, c. 11.—Several names of pickling fish. He odot. 2, c. 15, &c.

TARPA, Spurius Mætius, a critic at Rome in the age of Augustus. He was appointed with four others in the temple of Apollo, to examine the merit of every poetical composition which was to be deposited in the temple of the Muses. In this office he acted with great impartiality, though many taxed him with want of candour. All the pieces that were represented on the Roman stage previously received his approbation. Horat. 1. Sat. 10, v. 38.

TARPEIA, the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines, provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as she expressed it, what they carried on their left arms. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, consented, and as he entered the gates, to punish her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the bracelets and shields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid Fast. 1, v. 261. Amor., el. 10, v. 50.—Liv. 1, c. 11.—Propert. 4, el. 4.—A vestal virgin in the reign of Numa.—One of the warlike female attendants of Camilla in the Rutulian war. *Virg. TARPEIA LEX, was enacted A. U. C. 269, by Sp. Tarpeius, to empower all the magistrates of the republic to lay fines on offenders. This power belonged before only to the consuls. The fine was not to exceed two sheep and thirty oxen.

SP. TARPEIUS, the governor of the citadel of Rome, under Romulus. His descendants were called Montani and Capitolini.

TARPEIUS MONS, a hill at Rome about 80 feet in perpendicular height, from whence the Romans threw down their condemned criminals. It received its name from Tarpeia, who was buried there, and is the same as the Capitoline hill. [Vasi, in his "Picture of Rome," makes the Tarpeian rock still 55 feet high. A modern tourist, the Rev. W. Berrian, speaking of this rock, observes, "The Tarpeian rock is at present covered with a garden. This circumstance, together with the accumulation of the soil below, had so softened the terrors of the place, that it bore no resemblance to the terrific features in which fancy had portrayed it." A female traveller remarks: "Though it is certain that the Tarpeian rock was on the western side of the Capitoline Mount, it would be in vain now to enquire where was the precise spot of execution;—where Manlius was hurled down that of the precipice at the extremity of the Monte Caprino, or Monte de' Conservatori, that behind the Monte de' Conservatori. There is still left at enough in either to make it both tremendous and fatal; the punishments not only have the assaults of time, and violence, but the very convulsions of nature, contributed to lower it; for repeated earthquakes have shattered the friable tufo of which it is composed, and large fragments of it fell as late as the middle of the 15th century. The fall of these masses has diminished the elevation in two ways—by lowering the actual height, and filling up the base, to which the ruins of the overthrown buildings that once stood upon it have materially contributed. Still the average of various measurements and computations of its present elevation makes it above 60 feet; nor do I think it overrated. Certainly those who have maintained that there would be no danger in leaping from its summit, would not, I imagine, be bold enough to try the experiment themselves. The entrance to it is through a mean filthy passage which leads to an old wooden door." Liv. 6, c. 20.—Lucan. 7, v. 758.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 347 and 652.

TARQUINIUM, now Tarchina, a town of Etruria, built by Tarchon, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. Tarquinius Priscus was born or educated there, and he made it a Roman colony when he ascended the throne. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Liv. 1, c. 34, l. 27, c. 4.

TARQUINIA, a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, she privately conveyed away his body by night and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the following night she died. Some have attributed her death to excess of grief, or suicide, while others, perhaps more justly, have suspected Tullia, the wife of young Tarquin, of the murder.—A vestal virgin, who, as some suppose, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS, the 9th king of Rome, was son of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His first name was Lucumon, but this he changed when by the advice of his wife Tanaquil he had come to Rome. He called himself Lucius, and assumed the surname of Tarquinius, because born in the town of Tarquinii in Etruria. At Rome he distinguished himself so much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him at his death, the guardian of his children. This was insufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people immediately transferred the crown of the deceased monarch to the head of Lucumon. The people had every reason to be satisfied with their choice. Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He increased the number of the senate, and made himself friends by electing 100 new senators, whom he distinguished by the appellation of Patres minorum gentium, from those of the patrician body, who were called Patres majorum gentium. The glory of the Roman arms, which was supported with so much dignity by the former monarchs, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin showed that he possessed vigour and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines, and in the conquest of the 12 nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capitol, the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and useful ornaments, and many centuries after, such as were spectators of the stately mansions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed with more admiration and greater pleasure the more simple, though not less magnificent, edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the industry and the public spirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and subterraneous sewers, which supplied the city with fresh and wholesome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed pestilence and diseases. Tarquin was the first who introduced among the Romans the custom of canvassing for offices of trust and honour; he distinguished the monarch, the senators, and other inferior magistrates, with particular robes and ornaments, with ivory chairs at spectacles, and the hatchets carried before the public magistrates were by his order surrounded with bundles of sticks, to strike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was assassinated by the two sons of his predecessor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had sat on the throne, 578 years before Christ. Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Val. Max. 1, c. 4, l. 3, c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 817.—The second Tarquin, surnamed Superbus, from his pride and insolence, was grandson of Tarquinius Priscus. He ascended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia, the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her instigation that he murdered his father-in-law and seized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predecessors, he paid no regard to the decisions of the senate, or the approbation of the public assemblies, and by wishing to disregard both, he incurred the jealousy of the one and the odium of the other. The public treasury was soon exhausted by the continual extravagance of Tarquin, and to silence the murmurs of his subjects, he resolved to call their attention to war. He was successful in his military operations; the neighbouring cities submitted; but while the siege of Ardea was continued, the wantonness of the son of Tarquin for ever stopped the progress of his arms; and the Romans, whom a series of barbarity and oppression had hitherto provoked, no sooner saw the virtuous Lucretia stab herself not to survive the loss of her honour, (vid. Lucretia.) than the whole city and camp arose with indignation against the monarch. The gates of Rome were shut against him, and Tarquin was forever banished from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find support from even one of his subjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was established at Rome, and all Italy refused any longer to support the cause of an exiled monarch against a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, of king, and tyrant, mentioned with equal horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulsion from Rome. He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared so odious among the Romans, his reign was not without its share of glory; his conquests were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticoes at Rome was his wish, and with great magnificence and care he finished the capitol which his predecessor of the same name had begun. He also bought the Sibylline books which the Romans consulted with such religious solemnity. (vid. Sibyllæ.) Cic. pro Rab. & Tusc. 3, c. 27.—Liv. 1, c. 46, &c.—Dionys Hal. 3, c. 48, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 7 and 8.—Plin. 8, c. 41.—Plut. Val. Max. 9, c. 11.—Ovid. Fast. 2, c. 687.—Virg. Collatinus.)—Sextius, the eldest of the sons of Tarquin the Proud, rendered himself known by a variety of adventures. When his father besieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more easily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with stripes. This was an agreement between the father and the son, and Tarquin had no sooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppression of his father, than the people of Gabii intrusted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate enemy. When he had thus succeeded, he dispatched a private messenger to his father, but the monarch gave no answer to be returned to his son. Sextius inquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the messenger, that, when the message was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a stick the tallest poppies in his garden, the son followed the example, by putting to death the most noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The town soon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which some time after Tarquinus offered to Lucretia, was the cause of his father's exile and the total expulsion of his family from Rome. (vid. Lucretia.) Sextius was at last killed, bravely fighting in a battle during the war which the Latins sustained against Rome in the attempt of re-establishing the Tarquins on their throne. Ovid. Fast. —Liv.—A Roman senator who was accessory to Catiline's conspiracy.

TARRACO, now Tarragona, [a town of the Cosetani in Hispania Citerior, on the coast of the Mediterranean, and north-east of the mouth of the Bætis. This was the first place where the Scipios landed in the second Punic war; and which, after having fortified it, they made their place of arms. Tarraco, in consequence of this, soon rose to importance, and in time became the rival of Carthago Nova. It was the usual place of residence for the Roman praetors. On the division of Spain, which took place in the reign of Augustus, (vid. Hispania.) this city gave the name of Tarraconensis to what had been previously called Hispania Citerior.] Martial. 10, ep. 104, l. 13, ep. 118.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Sil. 3, v. 369, l. 15, v. 177.

TARRUTIUS. vid. Acca Laurentia.

TARSUS, [a river of Troas, near Zeleia, which, according to Strabo, had to be crossed, on account of its meandering route, twenty times by those who followed the road along its banks. Homer styles it Heptaporus, referring to its being crossed seven times.] Strab.

TARSUS, [a celebrated city of Cilicia Campestris, on the river Cydnus, not far from its mouth. Xenophon gives its name a plural form, Τάρσοι: later writers, however, adopt the singular, Τάρσος. This city was, from the earliest authentic records that we have of it, the capital of Cilicia; and, during the Persian dominion, was the residence of a dependent king. The people of Tarsus ascribed the origin of their city to Sardanapalus, who is said to have built it, together with Anchiale, in one day. When, however, the Greeks established themselves here, after the conquest of Alexander, they discarded the old account of the origin of Tarsus, and in its stead adopted one of a more poetic cast. Tarsus (Τάρσος.) in their language, signified a heel, and also a hoof. This name they connected with the old legend, that Bellerophon had been conveyed, in the course of his wanderings, by the winged horse Pegasus to the country of Cilicia. Upon this they founded the fable that the horse Pegasus had stumbled here, and left behind a deep impression of one of his feet. According to another account, he lost a hoof in this quarter; while a third made Bellerophon to have been unhorsed in this place, and, in falling, to have struck the earth violently with his heel. Strabo, however, makes the city to have been founded by Tripolemus and his Argive followers, who, in seeking for information of the wandering Ió, found here the traces of her hoofs. The Greeks, upon their first coming hither, found Tarsus a large and flourishing city, traversed by the Cydnus, a stream 200 feet broad. It continued to flourish for a long period after, and became so celebrated for learning and refinement, as to be the rival of Athens and Alexandria. Alexander nearly lost his life by bathing, when overheated, in the cold stream of the Cydnus, and it was here that Cleopatra paid her celebrated visit to Antony, in all the pomp and pageantry of eastern luxury, herself attired like Venus, and her attendants like Cupids, in a galley covered with gold, whose sails were of purple, the oars of silver, and cordage of silk; a fine description of which may be seen in Shakespeare's play of Antony and Cleopatra, Act 2, Scene 2. In the civil wars Tarsus sided with Cæsar, and the inhabitants called their city, out of compliment to him, Juliopolis. Tarsus was the birth-place of St. Paul. It still survives, but only as the shadow of its former self. It is now called Tarsous, and is in subjection to Adana, an adjacent city.] Lucan. 3, v. 225.—Mela, 1, c. 13.—Strab. 14.

TARTARUS, (pl. a. orum) one of the regions of hell, where, according to the ancients, the most impious and guilty among mankind were punished. It was surrounded with a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod it was a separate prison, at a greater distance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says, that it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance is by a large and lofty tower, whose gates are supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open. In Tartarus, according to Virgil, were punished such as had been disobedient to their parents, traitors, adulterers, faithless ministers, and such as had undertaken unjust and cruel wars, or had betrayed their friends for the sake of money. It was also the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c. were punished, according to Ovid. [The origin of the fable of Tartarus is traced in Hesiod's accounts of the wars of Saturn with the Titans, and of Jupiter with the Giants; these being vanquished, were condemned to the bottom of Tartarus, in the extremities of the earth. The Abbé Banier explains the fable of Tartarus as follows: the Greeks, he says, regarded the places situated to the east of them as higher than those which lay to the west; and hence they placed heaven in the former, and hell in the latter. According to this notion, the earliest Greeks placed their hell either in Spain, the residence of Pluto, or in Italy; countries situate to the west of them, and at that time but little known. Now, as the Titans, in the several conspiracies which they formed, were compelled to enter Italy and Spain, the poets fabled that they were precipitated into the gulf of Tartarus.] *Hesiod. TARTESSUS, [a town of Spain, situate, ac-ording to the most general, though not the most correct, opinion, in an island of the same name at the mouth of the Bætis, formed by the two branches of the river. No traces of this island now remain, as one of the arms of the river has disappeared. With regard to the actual position of the town itself much difference of opinion exists both in ancient and modern writers. Mannert is in favour of making Hispalis the Tartessus of Herodotus, and opposes the idea of its being the same either with Carteia or Gades, as many ancient writers maintain. It could not, according to him, correspond with Carteia, since Tartessus lay without the straits of Hercules, nor could it be the same as Gades, since Herodotus speaks of both Gades and Tartessus by their respective names, and the latter was not subject to the Phœnicians, but had a king of its own. According to Strabo, the Bætis itself was anciently called Tartessus, and the adjacent country Tartessus. Bochart, however, makes Tartessus to have been the Tarshish of Scripture, and the same with Gades.] Sil. 3, v. 399 and 411, l. 10, v. 538.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 19.—*Ovid. TATIAN, one of the Greek fathers, A. D. 172. The best edition of his works is that of Worth, 8vo. Oxon. 1700.

TATIENSES, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honour of Tatius, king of the Sabines. The Tatienses, who were partly the ancient subjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on Mount Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

TATIUS, (Titus) king of Cures among the Sabines, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought. The cries of the Sabine virgins at last stopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius consented to leave his ancient possessions, and with his subjects of Cures, to come and live in Rome, which, as stipulated, was permitted still to bear the name of its founder, whilst the inhabitants adopted the name of Quirites in compliment to the new citizens. After he had for six years shared the royal authority with Romulus, in the greatest union he was murdered at Lanuvium, B. C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambassadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to some authors. Liv. 1, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Rom.—Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 804.—Flor. 1, c. 1.

TAUNUS, a mountain in Germany, now Heyrich or Hoche, opposite Mentz. Tacit. 1, Ann. c. 56.

TAURI, a people of European Sarmatia, who inhabited Taurica Chersonesus, and sacrificed all strangers to Diana. The statue of this goddess, which they believed to have fallen down from heaven, was carried away to Sparta by Iphigenia and Orestes. Strab. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 99, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 16.—Eurip. Iphig.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 2, v. 80.—Sil. 14, v. 260.—Juv. 15, v. 116.

TAURICA CHERSONĒSUS, a large peninsula of Europe, at the south-west of the Palus Mæotis, now called the Crimæa. It was joined by an isthmus to Scythia, and was bounded by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the Euxine Sea, and the Palus Mæotis. The inhabitants, called Tauri, were a savage and uncivilized nation. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12. (vid. Tauri.)

TAURICA, the surname of Diana, because she was worshipped by the inhabitants of Taurica Chersonesus.

TAURISCUS, a sculptor. [vid. Apollonius.]

TAUROMINIUM, [now Tuormino,] a town of Sicily, between Messina and Catania. [An ancient city named Naxos previously occupied the site of Taurominium. There were in fact two cities of the name of Naxos, both erected in succession on the same spot. The first was destroyed by Dionysius the tyrant, and the inhabitants scattered over Sicily. The Siculi, instigated by the Carthaginians, subsequently rebuilt the city; but Dionysius again reduced it. Instead of destroying, however, he colonized it with a number of his mercenary soldiers: in process of time Syracuse regained her freedom, and Andromachus, a rich inhabitant of Naxos, having invited the old inhabitants of the latter city to return to their home, they accepted the offer. The city now changed its name to Tauromenium, from Taurus, the name of an adjacent mountain, and μουν, "a place of abode," the appellation being selected as designating more particularly their new place of residence.] The hills in the neighbourhood were famous for the fine grapes which they produced, and they surpassed almost the whole world for the extent and beauty of their prospects. There is a small river near it called Taurominius. Diod. 16.

TAURUS. [The mountains of Taurus, according to all the descriptions of the ancients, extended from the frontiers of India to the Ægean Sea. Their principal chain, as it shot out from Mount Imaus towards the sources of the Indus, wound, like an immense serpent, between the Caspian Sea and the Euxine on the one side, and the sources of the Euphrates on the other. Caucasus seems to have formed part of this line, according to Pliny; but, according to Strabo, who was better informed, the principal chain of Taurus runs between the basins of the Euphrates and the Araxes; and the geographer observes that a detached chain of Caucasus, that of the Moschin mountains, runs in a southern direction, and joins the Taurus. Modern accounts represent this junction as not very marked. Strabo, who was born on the spot, and who had travelled as far as Armenia, considers the entire centre of Asia Minor, together with all Armenia, Media, and Gordyene, or Koordistan, as a very elevated country, crowned with several chains of mountains, all of which are so closely joined together, that they may be regarded as one. "Armenia and Media," says he, "are situated upon Taurus." This plateau seems also to comprehend Koordistan, and the branches which it sends out extend into Persia as far as the great desert of Kerman on one side, and towards the sources of the Gihon and the Indus on the other. By thus considering the vast Taurus of the ancients as an upland plain, and not as a chain, the testimonies of Strabo and Pliny may be reconciled with the accounts of modern travellers. Two chains of mountains are detached from the plateau of Armenia to enter the peninsula of Asia; the one first confines and then crosses the channel of the Euphrates near Samosata; the other borders the Pontus Euxinus, leaving only narrow plains between it and that sea. These two chains, one of which is in part the Anti-Taurus, and the other the Paryadres, of the ancients, or the mountain Tcheldir or Keldir of the moderns, are united to the west of the Euphrates, between the towns of Siwas, Tocat, and Kaisariéh, by means of the chain of Argæus, now named Pergis-Dag, whose summit is covered with perpetual snows, a circumstance which, under so low a latitude, shows an elevation of from 9 to 10,000 feet. The centre of Asia resembles a terrace supported on all sides by chains of mountains. The chain which, breaking off at once from Mount Argæus and from Anti-Taurus, bounds the ancient Cilicia to the north, is more particularly known by the name of Taurus, a name which in several languages appears to have one common root, and simply signifies mountain. The elevation of this chain must be considerable, since Cicero affirms that it was impossible to armies before the month of June on account of the snow. Diodorus details the frightful ravines and precipices which it was necessary to cross in going from Cilicia into Cappadocia. Modern travellers who have crossed more to the west of this chain, now called Alah-Dag, represent it as similar to that of the Appenines and Mount Hæmus. It sends off to the west several branches, some of which terminate on the shores of the Mediterranean, as the Cragus, and the Masicystes of the ancients, in Lycia; the others, greatly inferior in elevation, extend to the coasts of the Archipelago opposite the islands of Cos and Rhodes. To the east, Mount Amanus, now the Alma-Dag, a detached branch of the Taurus, separates Cilicia from Syria, having only two narrow passes, the one towards the Euphrates, the other close by the sea; the first answers to the Pylæ Amanicæ of the ancients, the other to the Pylæ Syriæ. Two other chains of mountains are sent off from the western part of the central plateau. The one is the Baba-Dag of the moderns, which formed the Tmolus, the Messogis, and the Sipylus of the ancients, and which terminates towards the islands of Samos and Chios; the other, extending in a north-west direction, presents more elevated summits, among which are the celebrated Ida, and the Mysian Olympus. Lastly, the northern side of the plateau is propelled towards the Euxine, and gives rise to the chain of the Olgassys, now Elkas-Dag, a chain which fills with its branches all the chain between the Sangarius and the Halys. Throughout the range of mountains just described, limestone-rocks appear to predominate.] Mela, 1, c. 15, l. 3, c. 7 and 8.—Plin. 5, c. 27.—Titus Statilius, a consul distinguished by his intimacy with Augustus, as well as by a theatre which he built, and the triumph he obtained after a prosperous campaign in Africa. TAYGËTUS, or TAYGËTA, (orum.) a mountain of Laconia, in Peloponnesus, at the west of the river Eurotas. It hung over the city of Lacedæmon, and it is said that once a part of it fell down by an earthquake, and destroyed the suburbs. It was on this mountain that the Lacedæmonian women celebrated the orgies of Bacchus. ["From the western side of the plain," observes Mr. Dodwell, "rise the grand and abrupt precipices of Taygetus, which is broken into many summits. The bases also of the mountain are formed by several projections distinct from each other, which branch into the plain, and hence produce that rich assemblage and luxuriant multiplicity of lines, and tints, and shades, which render it the finest locality in Greece. All the plains and mountains that I have seen are surpassed in the variety of their combinations, and in the beauty of their appearance, by the plain of Lacedæmon and Mount Taygetus. The landscape may be exceeded in the dimensions of its objects, but what can exceed it in beauty of form and richness of colouring?"] Mela, 2, c. 5.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—Strab. 8.—Lucan. 5, v. 52.—*Virg. TEÂNUM, a town of Campania, on the Apian road, at the east of the Liris, called also Sidicinum, to be distinguished from another town of the same name at the west of Apulia, at a small distance from the coast of the Adriatic. The rights of citizenship were extended to it under Augustus. Cic. Cluent. 9 and 69.—Phil. 12, c. 11.—Horat. 1, ep. 1.—Plin. 31, c. 2.—Liv. 22, c. 27.

TEARUS, a river of Thrace, rising in the same rock from 38 different sources, some of which are hot and others cold. [Its sources, according to Herodotus, were equidistant from Herælum, a city near Perinthus, and from Apollonia on the Euxine, being two days journey from each.] Darius raised a column there when he marched against the Scythians, to commemorate the sweetness and salubrity of the waters of that river. Herodot. 4, c. 90, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

TECHES, a mountain of Pontus, from which the 10,000 Greeks had first a view of the sea. [It was situate at the north-eastern extremity of Pontus, near the river Ophis. It is called also Tesqua, and is now Tekeh.] Xenoph. Anab. 4.

TECHMESSA, the daughter of a Phrygian prince, called by some Teuthras, and by others Teleutas. When her father was killed in war by Ajax, son of Telamon, the young princess became the property of the conqueror, and by him she had a son called Eurysaces. Sophocles, in one of his tragedies, represents Techmessa as moving her husband to pity by her tears and entreaties when he wished to stab himself. Horat. 2. Od. 1, v. 6.—*Dictys. TECTOSAGES, or TECTOSAGÆ, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, whose capital was the modern Toulouse. They received the name of Tectosagæ quod sagis tegerentur. Some of them passed into Germany, where they settled near the Hercynian forest, and another colony passed into Asia. [After having laid under contribution all the country this side of Mount Taurus, they cantoned themselves in a part of Phrygia, extending to the confines of Cappadocia. (vid Galatia.) This nation was separated into three tribes, the Tolistoboi, on the confines of Phrygia Epictetus, the Trocmi on the side of Cappadocia, and the Tectosages occupying the intermediate territory.] The Tectosagæ were among those Gauls who pillaged Rome under Brennus, and who attempted some time after to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi TĒGĒA, or TEGĒA, now Mokliā, a town of Arcadia in the Peloponnesus, [east of the southern part of the Mænalian ridge,] founded by Tegeates, a son of Lycaon, or, according to others, by Altus. The gigantic bones of Orestes were found buried there, and removed to Sparta. Apollo and Pan were worshipped there, and there also Ceres, Proserpine, and Venus, had each a temple. The inhabitants were called Tegeates; and the epithet Tegæa is given to Atalanta, as a native of the place. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 7. Fast. 6, v. 531.—*Virg. TELĀMON, a king of the island of Salamis, son of Æacus and Endeis. He was brother to Peleus, and father to Teucer and Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius heros. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus in playing with the quoit, and he sailed to the island of Salamis, where he soon after married Glauce, the daughter of Cychreus, the king of the place. At the death of his father-in-law, who had no male issue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules when that hero took Laomedon prisoner and destroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his services with the hand of Hesione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the spoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. TELAMONIĀDES, a patronymic given to the descendants of Telamon.

TELCHINES, a people of Rhodes, said to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many useful arts, and, according to Diodorus, passed for the sons of the sea. They were the first who raised statues to the gods. They had the power of changing themselves into whatever shape they pleased, and, according to Ovid, they could poison and fascinate all objects with their eyes, and cause rain and hail to fall at pleasure. The Telchinians insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, so that they committed the grossest crimes, and offered violence even to their own mothers. Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 365, &c.

TELCĪNIA, a surname of Minerva at Teumessa in Bœotia, where she had a temple.

Paus. 9, c. 19.—Also a surname of Juno in Rhodes, where she had a statue at Ialysus, raised by the Telchinians, who settled there.—Also an ancient name of Crete, as the place from whence the Telchines of Rhodes were descended. Stat. 6, Sylv. 6, v. 47.

TELCĪNIUS, a surname of Apollo among the Rhodians. Diod. 5.

TELCĪS, a son of Europus, the son of Ægiæus. He was one of the first kings of the Peloponnesus.

TELEBŌÆ, or TELEBOES, a people of Ætolia, called also Taphians; some of whom left their native country, and settled in the island of Capreæ. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 715. [vid. Taphiæ.]

TELEBŌIDES, islands opposite Leucadia, [vid. preceding article.] Plin. 4, c. 12.

TELECLĪDES, an Athenian comic poet in the age of Pericles, one of whose plays, called the Amphictyons, is mentioned by ancient authors. Plut. in Nicia.—Athen. 8.

TELĒGŌNUS, a son of Ulysses and Circe, born in the island of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood, he went to Ithaca to make himself known to his father, but he was shipwrecked on the coast, and being destitute of provisions, he plundered some of the inhabitants of the island. Ulysses and Telemachus came to defend the property of their subjects against this unknown invader; a quarrel arose, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and, according to Hyginus, he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope also accompanied him in his return, and soon after the nuptials of Telegonus and Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a son, called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tusculum and Tibur, or Præneste, in Italy, and, according to some, he left one daughter, called Mamilia, from whom the patrician family of the Mamilii at Rome were descended. Horat. 3, od. 29, v. 8.—*Ovid. TELEMĀCHUS, a son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still in the cradle when his father went with the rest of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated war, Telemachus, anxious to see his father, went to seek him, and as the place of his residence, and the cause of his long absence were then unknown, he visited the court of Menelaus and Nestor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, where the suitors of his mother Penelope had conspired to murder him, but he avoided their snares, and by means of Minerva, he discovered his father who had arrived in the island two days before him, and was then in the house of Eumæus. With this faithful servant and Ulysses Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her suitors, and it was effected with success. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the island of Ææa, where he married Circe, or, according to others, Cassiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a son called Latinus. He some time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Clusium. Telemachus was accompanied in his visit to Nestor and Menelaus, by the goddess of wisdom, under the form of Mentor. It is said, that when a child, Telemachus fell into the sea, and that a dolphin brought him safe to shore after he had remained some time under water. From this circumstance Ulysses had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the seal which he wore on his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 and 125.—Ovid. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—Horat. 1, ep. 7, v. 41.—Homer. Od. 2, &c.—Lycophr. in Cass.

TELEPHUS, a king of Mysia, son of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He was exposed as soon as born on Mount Parthenius, but his life was preserved by a goat, and by some shepherds. According to Apolodorus, he was exposed, not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva, at Tegea, or, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras, king of the country, who married, or rather adopted as his daughter, Auge, and educated her son. Some, however, suppose that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be severely punished for her incontinence, and that Nauplius, unwilling to injure her, sent her to Teuthras, king of Bithynia, by whom she was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wished to know his parents, to go to Mysia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Mysia, where Teuthras offered him his crown and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hostilities of Idas, the son of Aphareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Mysians he soon routed the enemy and received the promised reward. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, the sudden appearance of an enormous serpent separated the two lovers; Auge implored the assistance of Hercules, and was soon informed by the god that Telephus was her own son. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus some time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the sons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to assist Priam against the Greeks, and with heroic valour he attacked them when they had landed on his coast. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, suddenly raised a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately rushed upon him, and wounded him so severely that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, and Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it could totally cure it. Upon this applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero observed that he was no physician, till Ulysses, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of one of the sons of Hercules, and who wished to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, persuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles consented; and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero scraped the rust from the point of his spear, and, by applying it to the sore, gave it immediate relief. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them against his father-in-law. *Hygin. fab. 101.—Paus. 8, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 7. &c.—Ælian. TELESINUS, a general of the Samnites, who joined the interest of Marius and fought against the generals of Sylla. He marched towards Rome, and defeated Sylla with great loss. He was afterwards routed in a bloody battle, and left in the number of the slain after he had given repeated proofs of valour and courage. [Telesinus appears to have been an able commander. Previous to the conflict, he had it in his power, according to Plutarch, to make himself master of the city of Rome had he been so inclined. He contented himself, however, with passing the night under the walls. In the battle which ensued, Sylla's left wing was entirely routed: the right commanded by Crassus, gained the victory.] *Plut. in Mar. &c.—A poet of considerable merit in Domitian's reign. *Juv. 7, v. 25.

TELLUS, a divinity, the same as the earth, the most ancient of all the gods after Chaos. She was mother by Cœlus of Oceanus, Hyperion, Ceus, Rhea, Japetus, Themis, Saturn, Phœbe, Tethys, &c. Tellus is the same as the divinity who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Ti-thea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c. She was generally represented in the character of Tellus, as a woman with many breasts, distended with milk, to express the fecundity of the earth. She also appeared crowned with turrets, holding a sceptre in one hand, and a key in the other, while at her feet was lying a tame lion without chains, as if intimate that every part of the earth can be made fruitful by means of cultivation. *Hesiod. TELMESUS, or TELMISSUS, [a name given to three towns in Asia Minor. One was in Lycia, on the Sinus Glaucum vel Telmissius. Its inhabitants were famous for their skill in augury. The second was in Caria, and the third in Pisidia.] Cic. de div. 1.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 37, c. 16.—Another in Lycia.—A third in Pisidia.

TELPHŪSA, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the Ladon, who gave her name to a town and fountain of that place. The waters of the fountain Telphusa were so cold that Tiresias died by drinking them. Diod. 4.—Strab. 9.—Lycophron. 1040.

TEMÉNITES, a surname of Apollo, which he received at Temenos, a small place near Syracuse, where he was worshipped. Cic. in Verr.

TEMÉNOS, a place of Syracuse, where Apollo, called Temenites, had a statue. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53.—Suet. Tib. 74.

TEMÉNUS, the son of Aristomachus, as the first of the Heraclidæ who returned to Peloponnesus with his brother Ctesiphontes in the reign of Tisamenes, king of Argos. Temenus made himself master of the throne of Argos, from which he expelled the reigning sovereign. After death he was succeeded by his son-in-law Deiphon, who had married his daughter Hyrnoth, and this succession was in preference to his own son. Apolod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18 and 19.

TEMESA, a town of Cyprus.—Another in Calabria in Italy, famous for its mines of copper, which were exhausted in the age of Strabo. Cic. Verr. 5, c. 15.—Liv. 34, c. 35.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 184.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 441. Met. 7, v. 207.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 6.

TEMPE, (plur.) a valley in Thessaly, between Mount Olympus at the north, and Ossa at the south, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. The poets have described it as the most delightful spot on the earth, with continually cool shades, and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered more pleasant and romantic, and which the gods often honoured with their presence. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but varied in the dimensions of its breadth, so as to be in some places scarce one acre and a half wide. All vallies that are pleasant, either for their situation or the mildness of their climate, are called Tempe by the poets. Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Diod. 4.—Dionys. Perieg. 219.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 1.—Plut. de Mus.—Virg. G. 2, v. 469.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 569.

TENCHTHËRI, a nation of Germany, [contiguous to the Sicambri.] who frequently changed the place of their habitation. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 56. H. 4, c. 21.

TĒNĒDOS, a small and fertile island of the Ægean Sea, opposite Troy, at the distance of about 12 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Lesbos. It was anciently called Leucophrys, till Tenes, the son of Cynus, settled there, and built a town, which he called Tenedos, from which the whole island received its name. It became famous during the Trojan war; it was there that the Greeks concealed themselves the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home without finishing the siege. [Tenedos declined in power after the fall of Troy, and became subject to the city of Alexandria Troas, on the continent. It was one of the first conquests of the Persians, who made themselves masters of it after having defeated the Ionians at the isle of Lada. In the Peloponnesian war it sided with the Athenians, and was in consequence laid under contribution by a Lacedæmonian admiral. When under the Roman power, its temple was pillaged by Verres, who carried away the statue of Tenes. The position of Tenedos, so near the mouth of the Hellespont, has always rendered it a place of importance in both ancient and modern times. Bochart derives the name from the Phœnician word Tinedum, red clay, which was found here and used for earthen ware.] *Homer. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21.—Ovid. TENES, a son of Cynus and Proclea. He was exposed on the sea on the coast of Troas by his father, who credulously believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cynus, and accused him of attempts upon her virtue when he refused to gratify her passion. Tenes arrived safe in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the sovereign. Some time after, Cynus discovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wished to be reconciled to his son whom he had so grossly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ship to the shore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and suffered his father's ship to be tossed about in the sea. From this circumstance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a resentment that cannot be pacified. Some, however, suppose that the proverb arose from the severity of a law made by a king of Tenedos against adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death with a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preserved at Tenedos, and afterwards deposited by Periclytus, son of Euty-machus, in the temple of Delphi, where it was still seen in the age of Pausanias. Tenes, as some suppose, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country against the Greeks, and he received divine honours after death. His statue at Tenedos was carried away by Verres. Strab. 12.—Paus. 10, c. 14.

TENOS, a small island in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophiussa, and also Hydrussa. from the number of its fountains. It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, universally esteemed by the ancients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was also called Tenos. Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.

TENTYRA, (plur.) and Tentyris, [a city of Egypt in the Thebaid, situate on the Nile, to the north-west of Koptos. This city was at variance with Ombos, the former killing, the latter adoring the crocodile; a horrid instance of religious fury, which took place in consequence of this quarrel, forms the subject of the 15th satire of Juvenal. About half a league from the ruins of this city stands the modern village of Denderah. Among the remains of Tentyra, is a temple of Isis, one of the largest structures in the Thebaid, and by far the most beautiful and in the best preservation. It contained until lately the famous zodiac which was framed in the ceiling of the temple. This interesting monument of former ages was taken down by a French traveller, M. Leloirain, after the most persevering exertions for 20 days, and transported down the Nile to Alexandria, whence it was shipped to France. The king of France has purchased it for 150,000 francs. The dimensions of the stone are 12 feet in length by 8 in breadth, including some ornaments which were 2 feet in length on each side. In thickness it is three feet. The planisphere and the square in which it was contained were alone removed, the side ornaments being allowed to remain. To obtain this relic of former ages proved a work of immense labour, as it had actually to be cut out of the ceiling and lowered to the ground. Many conjectures have been advanced by the learned, especially of France, on the antiquity of this Zodiac; Visconti, however, has shown in Larcher's Herodotus, that it could not have been prior to the conquest of Alexander. The subject of the antiquity of this monument will be found ably discussed also in the 24th, 25th and 26th volumes of the Oxford Classical Journal.] *Seneca. N. TEOS, or TEIOS, now Sigagik, a maritime town on the coast of Ionia in Asia Minor, opposite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecateus, who is by some deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an island. Augustus repaired Teos, whence he is often called the founder of it on ancient medals. Strab. 14.

TERENTIA, the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her, because she had been faithless to his bed when he was banished. Terentia married Salust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus. She lived to her 103d. or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—*Val. TERENTIANS, called also Cassia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus, and C. Cassius, A. U. C. 680. It ordered that the same price should be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the quæstors.—Another, by Terentius the tribune, A. U. C. 291, to elect five persons to define the power of the consuls, lest they should abuse the public confidence by violence or rapine.

TERENTIANS, a Roman to whom Longinus dedicated his treatise on the sublime.—[Maurus, a grammarian. vid. Maurus.]

TERENTIUS PUBLIUS, a native of Carthage in Africa, [born about the 560th year of Rome.] celebrated for the comedies he wrote. He was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his master and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himself to the study of Greek comedy with uncommon assiduity, and merited the friendship and patronage of the learned and powerful. Scipio, the younger Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been suspected, on account of their intimacy, of assisting the poet in his composition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expressions, and delicate sentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, seem perhaps to favour the supposition. [It is both probable in itself, and appears to have been credited as a fact by the ancients, that he was assisted in his compositions by Lælius and Scipio, as amateur critics.] Terence was in the 25th year of his age when his first play appeared on the Roman stage. All his compositions were received with great applause, but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated, and the audience, though composed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who spoke with such elegance and simplicity the language of nature, and supported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in translation than in the effusions of originality. It is said that he translated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, six of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio, and Hecyra. [Erasmus, one of the best judges of classical literature at the revival of learning, says, that there is no author from whom we can better learn the pure Roman style than from the poet Terence. It has been further remarked of him, that the Romans thought themselves in conversation, when they heard his comedies. Terence in fact gave to the Roman tongue its highest perfection, in point of elegance and grace, combined with the most perfect simplicity. For this ineffabilis amenitas, as it is called by Heinsius, he was equally admired by his own contemporaries and the writers in the golden period of Roman literature. He is called by Cæsar puri sermonis amator, and Cicero characterizes him, as—

“Quicquid come loquens, ac omnia dulciter dicens.”

Even in the last age of Latin poetry, and when his pure simplicity was so different from the style affected by the writers of the day, he continued to be regarded as the model of correct composition. Ausonius, in his beautiful poem addressed to his grandson, hails him, on account of his style, as the ornament of Latium. Among all the Latin writers, indeed, from Ennius to Ausonius, we meet with nothing so simple, so full of grace and delicacy—in fine, nothing that can be compared to his comedies for elegance of dialogue—presenting a constant flow of easy, genteel, unaffected conversation, which never subsides into vulgarity or grossness, and never rises higher than the ordinary level of polite conversation. Of this, indeed, he was so careful, that when he employed any sentence which he had found in the tragic poets, he stripped it of that air of grandeur and majesty which rendered it unsuitable for common life and comedy. The narratives in particular, possess a beautiful and picturesque simplicity. As to what may be called the poetical style of Terence, it has been generally allowed that he has used very great license in his versification. Politian is thought to have been the first who at all divided his plays into lines, but a separation was afterwards more correctly executed by Erasmus. Priscian says that Terence uses more licences than any other writer. Bentley, after Priscian, admitted every variety of iambic and Flochaic measure; and such were the apparent number of licences and mixture of different species of verse, that, according to Westerhövius, in order to reduce the lines to their original accuracy, it would be necessary to evoke Lælius and Scipio from the shades. As regards the respective merits of Terence and Plautus it may be observed, that the former was chiefly desirous of recommending himself to the approbation of a select few who were possessed of true wit and judgment, and the dread of whose censure always kept him within the bounds of good taste; while the sole object of Plautus, on the other hand, was to excite the merriment of an audience endued with little refinement. If, then, we merely consider the intrinsic merit of their productions, without reference to the circumstances or situation of the authors, still Plautus will be accounted superior in that vivacity of action, and variety of incident, which inflame curiosity and hurry on the mind to the conclusion. We delight, on the contrary, to dwell on every scene, almost on every sentence of Terence. Sometimes there are chasms in Plautus's fables, and the incidents do not properly adhere; in Terence all the links of the action depend on each other. Plautus has more variety in his exhibition of characters and manners, and more art in working up materials from the different employments and pursuits of men; but his pictures are often overcharged, while those of Terence are never more highly coloured than becomes the modesty of nature. The language of Plautus is more rich and luxurious than that of Terence, but is far from being so equal, uniform, and chaste. It is often stained with vulgarity, and sometimes swells beyond the limits of comic dialogue, while that of Terence is puro similitimus anni. The verses of Plautus are, as he himself calls them, numeri innumeri; and Herman declares, that, at least as now printed, they are full of every kind of error. Terence attends more to elegance and delicacy in the expression of passion, Plautus to comic expression. In fact, the great object of Plautus seems to have been to excite laughter among his audience, and in this object he completely succeeded; but for its attainment he has sacrificed many graces and beauties of the drama. The humour of Plautus consists chiefly in words and actions, that of Terence in matter. The pleasantries of Plautus, which were so often flat, low, or extravagant, finally drew down the censure of Horace, while Terence was extolled by that poetical critic as the most consummate master of dramatic art. In short, Plautus was more gay, Terence more chaste; the first has more genius and fire, the latter more manners and solidity. Plautus excels in low comedy and ridicule, Terence in drawing just characters, and in maintaining them to the last. The plots of both are artful, but Terence's are more apt to languish, while Plautus's spirit maintains the action with vigour. His invention was greatest; Terence's art and management. Plautus gives the stronger, Terence a more elegant delight. Plautus appears the better comedian of the two, Terence the better poet. Plautus shone most on the stage, Terence pleases best in the closet. vid. Dunlop's History of Roman Literature, Vol. 1, p. 334, seq.—Malkin's Classical Disquisitions, p. 5, seq. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some suppose that he was drowned in a storm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Christ, though others imagine he died in Arcadia or Leucadia, and that his death was accelerated by the loss of his property, and particularly of his plays, which perished in a shipwreck.

TERMINALIA, annual festivals at Rome, observed in honour of the god Terminus in the month of February. It was then usual for the peasants to assemble near the principal land-marks which separated their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were originally established by Numa, and though at first it was forbidden to shed the blood of victims, yet in process of time land-marks were plentifully sprinkled with it. *Ovid. TERMINUS, a divinity at Rome who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land. His worship was first introduced at Rome by Numa, who persuaded his subjects that the limits of their lands and estates were under the immediate inspection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with an human head without feet or arms, to imitate that he never moved, wherever he was placed. The people of the country assembled once a year with their families, and crowned with garlands and flowers the stones which separated their different possessions, and offered victims to the god who presided over their boundaries. It is said that when Tarquin the proud wished to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with cheerfulness; whence Ovid has said, Restitit, & magno cum Jove templa tenet.

TERPANDER, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos, 675 B. C. It is said that he appeared a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four. [Terpander is celebrated as having been the inventor of characters to express musical sounds in the several genera. With regard to the addition of three strings to the lyre, if the hymn to Mercury, which is ascribed to Homer, be genuine, it robs Terpander of this glory; doubts, however, have been entertained respecting its authenticity. If, however, the lyre had been before his time furnished with seven strings, it seems that Terpander was the first who played upon them at Lacedæmon. Terpander's improvement was displeasing to the Lacedæmonians, and he was fined by the Ephori, according to Plutarch. He is the most ancient author of Scolia that we know of, and is said also to have brought to perfection the manner of reciting the verses of Homer.] Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Plut. de Mus.

TERPSICHORE, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, as her name intimates, and with which she delighted her sisters. She is represented like a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument. TERRA, one of the most ancient deities in mythology, wife of Uranus, and mother of Oceanus, the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phœbe, Thetys, and Mnemosyne. By the Air she had Grief, Mourning, Oblivion, Vengeance, &c. According to Hyginus, she is the same as Tellus. [vid. Tellus.]

TERRACINA, [a town of Italy, the same as Anxur. vid. Anxur. It was situate in the country of the Volsci, north-east of Circeii. The Greeks called it Trachyna, which was subsequently corrupted into Terracina. It had once a harbour, but that is now choked up. Near Terracina are considerable remains of the Appian way.]

TERROR, an emotion of the mind which the ancients made a deity, and one of the attendants of the god Mars, and of Bellona.

TERTULLIANUS, (J. Septimius Florens.) a celebrated Christian writer of Carthage, who flourished A. D. 196. He was originally a Pagan, but afterwards embraced Christianity, of which he became an able advocate by his writings, which showed that he was possessed of a lively imagination, impetuous eloquence, elevated style, and strength of reasoning. [It is not known at what period of life he became a Christian. He himself informs us that he was originally a Pagan, and of corrupt morals; but the latter phrase must necessarily be taken in a mild sense, with reference to one who practised such rigid morality as Tertullian subsequently did. It is probable that before his conversion he taught rhetoric, and followed the profession of an advocate; at least, his works show a great acquaintance with the principles of law. He became bishop of Carthage, or, according to the vulgar opinion, of Rome. He soon, however, separated from the Catholic church to throw himself into the errors of the Montanists, who, exaggerating Christian purity, regarded as a sin all participation in the pleasures of the world, all communication with individuals attached to idolatry, and even the study of the sciences of the day. St. Jerome says that the envy and the calumnies of the Roman clergy against Tertullian were the occasion of this step on his part; and from this remark some have concluded, though without sufficient grounds, that he was expelled from the church of Rome by the intolerant spirit of his clerical brethren. However this may have been, a distinction is carefully observed between the works which Tertullian wrote previous to his separation from the Catholic church, and those which he composed afterwards, when he had ranged himself among the followers of Montanus. The former are four in number, his Apologeticus, and those which treat of baptism, of penitence, and prayer. The last of these is regarded as his first production. Some authors add a work in two volumes, addressed to his wife, in which he gives her directions as to the course of conduct which she should pursue in the state of widowhood. Most critics consider this to have been composed by him at an advanced age. The works written by Tertullian after he had become Montanist, are Apologetics for Christianity, Treatises on ecclesiastical discipline, and two species of polemical works, the one directed against heretics, the other against Catholics. The latter are four in number, "De pudicitia," "De fuga in persecutione," "De jejuniis," "De monogamia. His principal work is the "Apologeticus adversus gentes," mentioned above. It is addressed to the governors of the provinces; it refutes the calumnies which had been uttered against the religion of the Gospel, and shows that its professors were faithful and obedient subjects. It is the best work written in favour of Christianity during the early ages of the church. It contains a number of very curious historical passages on the ceremonies of the Christian church; as, for example, a description of the agape, or love-feasts. Tertullian re-moulded this work, and it appeared under the new title, "Ad nationes." In its altered state it possesses more method, but less fire, than at first. The writings of Tertullian show an ardent and impassioned spirit, a brilliant imagination, a high degree of natural talent, and profound erudition. His style, however, is obscure, though animated, and betrays the foreign extraction of the writer. The perusal of Tertullian is very important for the student of ecclesiastical history. He informs us, more correctly than any other writer, respecting the Christian doctrine of his time, the constitution of the church, its ceremonies, and the attacks of heretics against Christianity. Tertullian was held in very high esteem by the subsequent fathers of the church. St. Cyprian read his works incessantly, and used to call him, by way of eminence, "The Master." Vincent of Lerius used to say "That every word of Tertullian was a sentence, and every sentence a triumph over error." The best edition of Tertullian is that of Semlerus, 4 vols. 8vo. Hal. 1770; and of his Apology, that of Havercamp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1718.

TETHYS, the greatest of the sea-deities, was wife of Oceanus, and daughter of Uranus and Terra. She was mother of the chief rivers of the universe, such as the Nile, the Alpheus, the Mæander, Simois, Peneus, Evenus, Scamander, &c. and about 3000 daughters called Oceanides. Tethys is confounded by some mythologists with her grand-daughter hetis, the wife of Peleus, and the mother of Achilles. The word Tethys is poetically used to express the sea. Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 509, l. 9, v. 498. Fast. 2, v. 191.—Hesiod. Theogn. v. 336.—Il. 14, v. 302.

TETRAPŌLIS, a name given to the city of Antioch, the capital of Syria, because it was divided into four separate districts, each of which resembled a city. Some apply the word to Seleucia, which contained the four large cities of Antioch near Daphne, Laodicea, Apamea, and Seleucia in Pieria.—The name of [Doris in Greece, from its four cities, vid. Doris.] Strab. 8.

TETRICA, a mountain of the Sabines near the river Fabaris. It was very rugged and difficult of access, whence the epithet Tetricus was applied to persons of a morose and melancholy disposition. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 713.

TETRICUS, a Roman senator, saluted emperor in the reign of Aurelian. He was led in triumph by his successful adversary, who afterwards heaped the most unbounded honours upon him and his son of the same name.

TEUCER, a king of Phrygia, son of the Scamander by Idea. According to some authors, he was the first who introduced among his subjects the worship of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucris, and his subjects Teuceri. His daughter Batea married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who succeeded him in the government of Teucris. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.—A son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's suitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrepidity. It is said that his father refused to receive him into his kingdom, because he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This severity of the father did not dishearten the son; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the assistance of Belus, king of Sidon, he built a town, which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted to no purpose to recover the island of Salamis, after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, in which a man was annually sacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some suppose that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a less received opinion, he went to settle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Gaul. Homer. Il. 1, v. 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 623.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 29.—Justin. 44, c. 3.—Patere. 1, c. 1.

TEUCRI, a name given to the Trojans, from Teucer their king. [According to a passage in Virgil, (Æn. 3, v. 108.) the Teuceri were a colony from Crete, who settled in Troas previous to the founding of Troy, and were the founders of the Trojan race. Apollodorus, however, following probably the current Grecian fables on this subject, makes the Teuceri to have been descended from Teucris a son of the Scamander. Heyne, in an excursus to the passage of Virgil mentioned above, gives the preference to the latter account. It is probable that the Teuceri were only a branch of the inhabitants of Troas, and originally of Thracian descent. Such at least is the opinion of Mannert.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 42 and 239.

TEUCRIA, a name given to Troy, from Teucer one of its kings. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 26.

TEUCTERI, a people of Germany, at the east of the Rhine. Tacit. de Germ. c. 22.

TEUMESSUS, a mountain of Bœotia with a village of the same name, where Hercules, when young, killed an enormous lion. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 331.

TEUTA, a queen of Illyricum, B. C. 231, who ordered some Roman ambassadors to be put to death. This unprecedented murder was the cause of a war, which ended in her disgrace. Flor. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 34, c. 6.

TEUTAS, or TEUTATES, a name of Mercury among the Gauls. The people offered human victims to this deity. [He was worshipped by the Britons also. Some derive the name from two British words "Deu-tall," which signify God, the parent or creator, a name properly due only to the Supreme Being, who was originally intended by that name.] Lucan. 1, v. 445.—Cæsar. Bell. G.

TEUTHRAS, a king of Mysia on the borders of the Caycus. He adopted as his daughter, or, according to others, married Auge the daughter of Aleus, when she fled away into Asia, from her father, who wished to punish her for her amours with Hercules. Some time after his kingdom was invaded by Ius the son of Aphareus, and to remove this enemy, he promised Auge and his crown to any one who could restore tranquillity to his subjects. This was executed by Telephus, who afterwards proved to be the son of Auge, who was promised in marriage to him by right of his successful expedition. The 50 daughters of Teuthras, who became mothers by Hercules, are called Teuthrantia turba. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 25.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 9.—Heroid. 9, v. 51.—Hygin. fab. 100.

TEUTOBURGIENSIS SALTUS, a forest of Germany, between Ems and Lippa, where Varus and his legions were cut to pieces. [The Saltus Teutobergiensis is now the Bishopric of Paderborn. vid. Arminius and Varus.] Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 60.

TEUTŌNI, and TEUTŌNES, [a name given to several united tribes of Germany,] who with the Cimbri, made incursions upon Gaul and cut to pieces two Roman armies. They were at last defeated by the consul Marius, and an infinite number made prisoners. (vid. Cimbri.) [The name Teutones, according to Mannert, was not that of a particular tribe of Germany, but of the whole nation, and derived from the circumstance of their all worshipping the same deity, Tuisco or Teut. The modern German term Deutsche (pronounced as if written Teutsche) still shows traces of the ancient name. Probably both Teutones and Teut should, from the analogy of the modern pronunciation, be enunciated as if written Teitones and Teite.] Cic. pro Manil. Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plut. in Mar.—Martial. 14, ep. 26.—Plin. 4, c. 14.

THAIS, a famous courtesan of Athens, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, and gained such an ascendancy over him, that she made him burn the royal palace of Persopolis. After Alexander's death, she married Ptolemy king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms, both mental and personal, which were of a superior nature, and on this account she is called Mandrea by Propert. 2, el. 6.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 604. de Rom. Am. v. 384.—Plut. in Alex.—Juv. 3, v. 93.—Athen. 13, c. 13.

THALA, a town of Africa. Tacit. Ann. 3 c. 21.

THALAME, a town of Messenia, famous for a temple and oracle of Pasiphæe. Plut. in Agul.

THALASSIUS, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed, as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

THALES, one of the seven wise men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. [He was descended from Phœnician parents, who had left their country and settled at Miletus. The wealth which he inherited, and his own superior abilities, raised him to distinction among his countrymen, so that he was early employed in public affairs.] Like the rest of the ancients, he travelled in quest of knowledge, and for some time resided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the priests of Memphis he was taught geometry, astronomy, and philosophy. [It is probable that he was more indebted to his own ingenuity than to their instructions; for while he was among them he taught them, to their great astonishment, how to measure the height of their pyramids. It cannot be supposed that Thales could acquire much mathematical knowledge from a people incapable of solving so easy a problem. The method pursued by Thales was this: At the termination of the shadow of the pyramid, he erected a staff perpendicular to the surface of the earth; and thus obtained two right-angled triangles, which enabled him to infer the ratio of the height of the pyramid to the length of its shadow, from the ratio of the height of the staff, to the length of its shadow. In mathematics, Thales is said to have invented several fundamental propositions, which were afterwards incorporated into the elements of Euclid; particularly the following theorems: that a circle is bisected by its diameter; that the angles at the base of an isosceles triangle are equal; that the vertical angles of two intersecting lines are equal; that if two angles and one side of one triangle, be equal to two angles and one side of another triangle, the remaining angles and sides are respectively equal; and that the angle in a semicircle is a right angle. Astronomical, as well as mathematical, science seems to have received considerable improvements from Thales. He was so well acquainted with the celestial motions, as to be able to predict an eclipse, though probably with no great degree of accuracy as to time; for Herodotus, who relates this fact, only says, that he foretold the year in which it would happen. He taught the Greeks the division of the heaven into five zones, and the solstitial and equinoctial points, and approached so near to the knowledge of the true length of the solar revolution, that he corrected their calendar, and made their year contain 365 days.] Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of every thing. [It is probable, that by the term water Thales meant to express the same idea which the cosmogonists expressed by the word chaos, the notion annexed to which was, a turbid and muddy mass, from which all things were produced.] He was the founder of the Ionic sect, which distinguished itself for its deep and abstruse speculations, under the successors and pupils of the Milesian philosopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the master of Socrates. Thales was never married; and when his mother pressed him to choose a wife, he said he was too young. The same exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philosopher eluded them by observing that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial state. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Christian era. His compositions on philosophical subjects are lost. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. &c.—A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared by his rhapsodies the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous institutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil society.

THALESTRIA, or THALESTRIS, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 35 days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 4.

THALIA, one of the Muses, who presided over festivals, and over pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook. Her dress appears shorter, and not so ornamented as that of the other Muses. Horat. 4. Od. 6, v. 25. Mart. 9, ep. 75.—Plut. in Symp. &c.—Virg. Ec. 6, v. 2.—An island in the Tyrrhene Sea.

THALYSSIA, Greek festivals celebrated by the people of the country in honour of Ceres, to whom the first fruits were regularly offered. Schol. Theocr. 5.

THAMIRAS, a Cilician who first introduced the art of augury in Cyprus, where it was religiously preserved in his family for many years. Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 3.

THAMYRAS, or THAMYRIS, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed that the conquered should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered, and the Muses deprived him of his eye-sight and of his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. [Probably the whole allegory of the blindness of Thamyras had its rise from his having injured the organ of sight by too intense application to the study of music and poetry.] Homer. Il. 2, v. 594, l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62.—Art. Am. 3, v. 399.—Paus. 4, c. 33.

THAPSACUS, a city on the Euphrates. [It is now El-Deer. At Thapsacus was the famous ford of the Euphrates. This ford was passed by Cyrus the younger in his expedition against Artaxerxes; afterwards by Darius after his defeat by Alexander at Issus: and near three years after by Alexander in pursuit of Darius, previous to the battle of Arbela.]

THAPSUS, [now Demsas, a town of Africa Propria, on the coast, south-east of Hadrumetum,] where Scipio and Juba were defeated by Cæsar. Sil. 3, v. 261.—Liv. 29, c. 30, l. 33, c. 48.—A town at the north of Syracuse in Sicily.

THARGELIA, festivals in Greece in honour of Apollo and Diana. They lasted two days, and the youngest of both sexes carried olive-branches, on which were suspended cakes and fruits. Athen. 12.

THASIVS, or THRASIUS, a famous sooth-sayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris, king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 549.—A surname of Hercules, who was worshipped at Thasos.

THASOS, or THASUS, a small island in the Ægean, on the coast of Thrace, opposite the mouth of the Nestus, anciently known by the name of Jeria, Odonis, Jethria, Acte, Ogygia, Chryse, and Ceresis. It received that of Thasos from Thasus the son of Agenor, who settled there when he despaired of finding his sister Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and so uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos became proverbial. Its wine was universally esteemed, and its marble quarries were also in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and silver. The capital of the island was also called Thasos. Liv.

THASUS, a son of Neptune, who went with Cadmus to seek Europa. He built the town of Thasus in Thrace. Some make him brother of Cadmus. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

THAUMACI, a town of Thessaly on the Maliac gulf. Liv. 32, c. 4.

THAUMANTIAS and THAUMANTIS, a name given to Iris, the messenger of Juno, because she was the daughter of Thaumias, the son of Oceanus and Terra, by one of the Oceanides.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 479, l. 14, v. 845.

THEAGÈNES, an athlete of Thamos, famous for his strength. His father's name was Timosthenes, a friend of Hercules. He was crowned above a thousand times at the public games of the Greeks, and became a god after death. Paus. 6, c. 6 and 11.—Plut.—A writer who published commentaries on Homer's works.

THEANO, the wife of Metapontus, son of Sisyphus, presented some twins to her husband, when he wished to repudiate her for her barrenness. The children were educated with the greatest care, and some time afterwards, Theano herself became mother of twins. When they were grown up, she encouraged them to murder the supposititious children, who were to succeed to their father's throne in preference to them. They were both killed in the attempt, and the father, displeased with the conduct of Theano, repudiated her to marry the mother of the children whom he had long considered as his own. Hygin. fab. 186.—A daughter of Cisseus, sister to Hecuba, who married Antenor, and was supposed to have betrayed the Palladium to the Greeks, as she was priestess of Minerva. Homer. Il. 6, v. 298.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Dictys. Cret. 5, c. 8.—A priestess of Athens, daughter of Menon, who refused to pronounce a curse upon Alcibiades, when he was accused of having mutilated all the statues of Mercury. Plut.—The mother of Pausanias. She was the first, as it is reported, who brought a stone to the entrance of Minerva's temple to shut up her son when she heard of his crimes and perfidy to his country. Polyan. 8.—A Trojan matron, who became mother of Mimas by Anycus, the same night that Paris was born. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 703.

THEARIUS, a surname of Apollo at Trœzene. Paus. 2, c. 51.

THEATÈTES, a Greek epigrammatist.

THEBE, [a city of Mysia, north of Adramyttium, and called for distinction sake Hypoplacia. This name it received from the adjacent district, which was styled Hypoplacia, because lying at the foot of Mount Placus, (Ἵρος, Πλακος). Thebe is said to have derived its name from a daughter of Cilix. It was taken by Achilles during the Trojan war. Andromache was born here.]

THEBÆ, (arum), a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, situate on the banks of the river Ismenus. The manner of its foundation is not precisely known. Cadmus is supposed to have first begun to found it by building the citadel Cadmea. It was afterwards finished by Amphion and Zethus, but, according to Varro, it owed its origin to Ogyges. The government of Thebes was monarchical, and many of the sovereigns are celebrated for their misfortunes, such as Laius, Œdipus, Polynices, Eteocles, &c. The war which Thebes supported against the Argives is famous, as well as that of the Epigoni. The Thebans were looked upon as an indolent and sluggish nation, and the words of Theban pig became proverbial to express a man remarkable for stupidity and inattention. This, however, was not literally true; under Epaminondas, the Thebans, though before dependant, became masters of Greece, and every thing was done according to their will and pleasure. When Alexander invaded Greece he ordered Thebes to be totally demolished, because it had revolted against him, except the house were the poet Pindar had been born and educated. In this dreadful period 6000 of its inhabitants were slain, and 30,000 sold for slaves. Thebes was afterwards repaired by Cassander, the son of Antipater, but it never rose to its original consequence, and Strabo, in his age, mentions it merely as an inconsiderable village. The monarchical government was abolished there at the death of Xanthus, about 1190 years before Christ, and Thebes became a republic. It received its name from Thebe, the daughter of Asopus, to whom the founder Amphion was nearly related. Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in Pel. Flam. and Alex.—C. Nep. in Pel. Epam. &c.—Horat. Art. Poet. 394.—Ovid. Met.—Curt. 3, c. 4.—Liv. 37, c. 19.—Strab. 11.—An ancient celebrated city of Thebais in Egypt, called also Hecatompyles, on account of its hundred gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter. In the time of its splendour it extended above 27 miles. [The origin of this great city is lost amid the obscurity of fable. By some it was ascribed to Osiris, by others to one of the earliest of the Egyptian kings. The probability is that it gradually attained to its vast dimensions, in consequence of the additions made by successive monarchs. The Egyptians, however, according to Diodorus, believed Thebes to have been the first city founded upon the earth, and in truth we have no account at the present day of any of earlier origin. Its most flourishing period appears to have been prior to the building of Memphis, when Thebes was the capital of all Egypt, the royal residence, and the abode of the highest sacerdotal college in the land. It must from its very situation have been the middle point for the caravan trade to the south, and through it passed very probably all the productions and wares of Asia. Homer, therefore, who describes it as a powerful city, containing a hundred gates, must have derived his information from the Phœnicians engaged in the overland trade. It is idle to suppose that the poet himself had been there in person, when of the rest of Egypt he knew nothing but the mere name, and had but a confused idea even of the Mediterranean coast. The poet informs us that out of each of these 100 gates, Thebes could send forth 200 chariots to oppose an enemy; an evident exaggeration, either originating in his own fancy, or received from, and characteristic of, the Phœnician traders. Some have supposed that by gates Homer means those of temples and palaces, but this appears to be both a forced and unnatural explanation. Thebes sank in importance when lower Egypt began to be more thickly inhabited, and the new capital Memphis arose. A second, and a third sacerdotal college, were established in the same quarter; hither, too, trade and commercial intercourse of all kind directed their course, and Thebes in consequence became, compared with its former splendour, almost a deserted city. It still remained, however, the chief seat of the religion of Egypt, a circumstance which enabled it to retain a tolerable population, until the fury of Cambyzes, or more correctly speaking, his religious fanaticism, destroyed most of its priesthood and overthrew its proudest structures. From this period it rapidly declined. Herodotus visited the city during the Persian government of Egypt, and speaks of the temple of Zeus; but his silence respecting the condition of the rest of the city must always remain an enigma. Diodorus, who speaks of Thebes as of a city already in ruins, takes particular notice of four principal temples. He speaks of sphinxes, colossal figures decorating the entrances, porticoes, pyramidal gateways, and stones of astonishing magnitude which entered into their structure. In the descriptions given by modern travellers, these monuments are still recognized. Browne tells us, that "there remain four immense temples, yet not so magnificent nor in so good a state of preservation as those of Denderah" Norden remarks, "It is surprising how well the gilding, the ultramarine, and various other colours still preserve their brilliancy." He speaks also of a colonnade, of which thirty-two columns are still standing, of platforms, preserved galleries, and other remains of antiquity, which he has represented in his plates, and which he thinks the more worthy of attention as they appear to be the same that are mentioned by Philostratus in his account of the temple of Memnon. No description can give an adequate idea of these wonders of antiquity, both in regard to their incredible number and their gigantic size. Their form, proportions, and construction, are almost as astonishing as their magnitude. The mind is lost in a mass of colossal objects, every one of which is more than sufficient to absorb its whole attention. On the western side of the river stood the famed Memnonium; here also are numberless tombs in the form of subterranean excavations, and containing many human bodies in the state of mummies, sometimes accompanied with pieces of papyrus and other ancient curiosities. These have been the subject of ardent research; and the trade of digging for tombs and mummies, being found gainful, has been resorted to by numerous Arabs belonging to the place. With respect to the mummies, some are found in wooden cases shaped like the human body. These belonged to persons superior to the lowest rank, but differing from one another in the quantity and quality of the linen in which the body had been wrapped. The mummies of the poorest classes are found without any wooden covering, and wrapped in the coarsest linen. These differ from the former also in being often accompanied with pieces of papyrus, on which Belzoni supposes that an account of the lives of the deceased had been written, while a similar account was carved on the cases of the more opulent. These cases are generally of Egyptian sycamore, but very different from one another with respect to plainness or ornament. Sometimes there are one or two inner cases besides the outer one. Leaves and flowers of acacia are often found round the body, and sometimes lumps of asphaltum, about two pounds in weight. The case is covered with a cement, resembling plaster of Paris, in which various figures are cast. The whole is painted, generally with a yellow ground, on which are hieroglyphics and figures of green.—But to return to the ruins of Thebes: on the east side of the Nile, at Carnac, and Luxor, amidst a multitude of temples, there are no tombs; these are confined to the west bank. An iron sickle was lately found under one of the buried statues, nearly of the shape of those which are now in use, though thicker; it is supposed to have lain there since the invasion of Cambyses, when the idols were concealed by the superstitious to save them from destruction. Belzoni and others uncovered and carried away many specimens of these antique remains, such as sphinxes, obelisks, and statues. On this same side of the river, no palaces or traces of ancient human habitations are met with; whereas on the western side, at Medinet Aboo, there are not only Propylæa, and temples highly valued by the antiquarian, but dwelling houses, which seem to point out that place as having been once a royal residence.—From the tombs in the vicinity of Thebes, we may obtain evidences of the state of the arts among the ancient Egyptians. The tombs of the better classes are highly magnificent, consisting of different apartments adorned with figures representing the different actions of life, such as agricultural operations, religious ceremonies, feasts, and funeral processions; these last being generally predominant. Their paintings, which are described by Mr. Hamilton, contain numerous articles illustrating the domestic habits of the Egyptians. Small idols are found lying about, and sometimes vases containing the intestines of the mummies, generally of baked clay painted, some few of alabaster: there is much pottery besides, and many wooden vessels. Belzoni found some gold leaf beaten nearly as thin as ours. No instruments of war are found in these places. The last mentioned traveller only found an arrow with a copper point, well fixed in one end, while the other end had a notch. Figures of the scarabæus or beetle, a highly sacred animal among the Egyptians, are sometimes found executed in alabaster, verde antico, and other materials. From the garments in which the mummies are sometimes wrapped, it appears that linen manufactures were brought to a great degree of perfection. They understood the tanning of leather, of which shoes are found. Some of the leather is stained with various colours, and embossed. The art of gilding is proved to have existed among them in a state of great forwardness. They knew how to cast copper, as well as how to form it into sheets. A few specimens of varnishing are found, which show that this art and the baking of the varnish on clay, were in such perfection, that it appears doubtful whether it could now be any where imitated. In the art of painting they were a little behind, in not giving their figures relief by shading; but their colours, particularly the red and green, are well disposed, and produce a splendid effect, especially by candle light. Their drawings are always in profile. Some drawings are found preparatory to sculpturing on the walls, and others in different stages of their execution. Belzoni observed some drawings executed by learners, and afterwards corrected in faulty places by a master with a different coloured chalk. This same traveller discovered, in some brick buildings of the highest antiquity, evidences that the Egyptians understood the building of arches with the key-stone, though their predilection for numerous columns in the construction of their large temples, led them in these buildings to neglect the arch. Their sculptures are executed in four kinds of stone; sandstone, which is comparatively soft, a hard calcareous stone, breccia, and granite. This last is more finely polished than it could be by our present tools.] Plin. 5, c. 9.—Juv. 15, v. 16.—Tacit. Ann. 2.—Herodot. 2 and 3.—Diod. 2.—*Homer. THEBAIS, a country in the southern parts of Egypt, of which Thebes was the capital.—There have been some poems which have borne the name of Thebais, but of these the only one extant is the Thebais of Statius. It gives an account of the war of the Thebans against the Argives, in consequence of the assension of Eteocles with his brother Polyneices. The poet was twelve years in composing it.—A river of Lydia.—A name given to a native of Thebes.

THEBE, the wife of Alexander, tyrant of Phœæ. She was persuaded by Pelopidas to murder her husband.

THEMIS, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra who married Jupiter against her own inclination. She became mother of Dice, Irene, Eunomia, the Parcæ, and Horæ; and was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion, who consulted it with great solemnity, and was instructed how to repair the loss of mankind. She was generally attended by the seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand, and a pair of scales in the other. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 321.—A daughter of Illus, who married Capys and became mother of Anchises. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

THEMISCYRA, a town of Cappadocia, at the mouth of the Thermodon, belonging to the Amazons. The territories round it bore the same name. [The town of Themiseyra appears to have been one of very early origin. Scylax mentions it as a Grecian state; and Herodotus also speaks of it. Both of these writers, however, place it at the mouth of the Thermodon; whereas, Ptolemy locates it in the centre of the district Themiscysra, that is, more inland. This place appears to have been destroyed in the course of the Mithridatic war. It is rather surprising that many of the ancient writers, and among them even Æschylus, never use the name Themiseyra as that of a city, but always as designating a plain. Diodorus, however, makes the founder of the Amazonian nation to have built this city on the Thermodon.]

THEMISON, a famous physician of Laodicea, disciple to Asclepiades. He was founder of a sect called methodists, because he wished to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of physic. He flourished in the Augustan age. Plin. 27, c. 1.—Juv. 10.

THEMISTA, or THEMISTIS, a goddess, the same as Themis.

THEMISTIUS, a celebrated philosopher of Paphlagonia, born A. D. 317, greatly esteemed by the Roman emperors, and called Euphrades, the fine speaker, from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman senator [by the emperor Constantius,] and prefect of Constantinople by Theodosius the Great, and always distinguished for his liberality and munificence. His school was greatly frequented. He wrote, when young, some commentaries on Aristotle, fragments of which are still extant, and 33 of his orations. He professed himself to be an enemy to flattery, and though he often deviates from this general rule in his addresses to the emperors, yet he strongly recommends humanity, wisdom, and clemency. [Though he was a heathen, he opposed the Arian emperor Valens in his persecution of the Orthodox, and lived in a state of intimate friendship with Gregory Nazianzen.] The best edition of Themistius is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

THEMISTO, daughter of Hypseus, was the third wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, by whom she had four sons, called Ptous, Leucon, Schœneus, and Erythroos. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her husband's second wife, but she killed her own by means of Ino, who lived in her house in the disguise of a servant maid, and to whom she intrusted her bloody intentions, upon which she destroyed herself. Paus. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias 10, c. 24.

THEMISTOCLES, a celebrated general born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotolum, a native of Halicarnassus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices so flagrant, and an inclination so incorrigible, that his father disinherited him. This, which might have disheartened others, roused the ambition of Themistocles, and the protection which he was denied at home he sought in courting the favours of the populace, and in sharing the administration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was intrusted to his care. While the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were opposing the Persians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themistocles, and the combined fleet of the Peloponnesians were directed to destroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obstinate wish of the generals to command the Grecian fleet might have proved fatal to the interest of the allies, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and by nominating his rival Eurybiades master of the expedition, shown the world that his ambition could stoop when his country demanded his assistance. The Persian fleet was distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a decisive battle had never been fought if Themistocles had not used threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favourable answers of the oracle to second his measures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by sea against an enemy whom they saw victorious by land, plundering their cities, and destroying all by fire and sword; but before they were dispersed, Themistocles sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the bay of Salamis, prevented their escape; and while he wished to crush them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B. C. 480, was decisive; the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honour of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to ensure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success; Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed on the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguished honours, and by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, her Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch, whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness; and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favourites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. Such kindnesses from a monarch, from whom he perhaps expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and, according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain; and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica, and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the Christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprize. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and, in the midst of adversity, possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendour, and even to command fortune. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Paus. 1, c. 1. 8, c. 52.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 12, l. 9, c. 18, l. 13, c. 40.—A writer, some of whose letters are extant. [These letters have been ascribed to the Athenian commander of the same name, but without sufficient evidence. The best edition is that of Bremer, Lips. 1776, 8vo.]

THEMISTOGÈNES, an historian of Syracuse, in the age of Artaxerxes Mnemon. He wrote on the wars of Cyrus the younger, a subject ably treated afterwards by Xenophon.

THEOCLYMÈNUS, a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c.—Hygin. fab. 128.

THEOCRITUS, a Greek poet who flourished at Syracuse in Sicily, 282 B. C. His father's name was Praxagoras or Simichus, and his mother's Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose praises he sung and whose favours he enjoyed. [He was the pupil of Asclepiades of Samos, and of Philetas of Cos. He became the friend of Aratus, and passed a part of his life at Alexandria, and the remainder in Sicily.] Theocritus distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, of which 30 idyllia and some epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance, and simplicity. Virgil, in his eclogues, has imitated and often copied him. [Theocritus has sometimes been censured for the rusticity, and even indelicacy, of some of his expressions. The latter charge admits of no defence. With regard to the former it must be observed, that they who conceive that the manners and sentiments of shepherds should always be represented not as they are, or have been in any age or country, but greatly embellished or refined, do not seem to have a just idea of the nature of pastoral poetry. The Idylls of Theocritus are in general faithful copies of nature, and his characters hold a proper medium between rudeness and refinement. The thirty idylls mentioned above do not appear to have been all of them the productions of Theocritus. They were composed by different poets, and were united into one collection by some grammarians of Alexandria. They are not even all of the Bucolic or Pastoral kind; some of them are fragments of epic poems, two belong to the class of mimes, and many resemble in some respect lyric effusions. The "Epithalamium of Helen," one of the thirty, has been supposed to bear a resemblance to the Song of Solomon. Some have concluded from this that Theocritus was acquainted with the latter piece. The discussion is a very interesting one for Biblical critics; since if it can be shown that Theocritus knew of the Song of Solomon, the commonly received opinion, according to which this poem did not exist in Greek at the time of Theocritus, (Ptolemy Philadelphus having only caused the Pentateuch to be translated into Greek), is completely refuted. Our limits forbid any investigation of this subject. It is believed, however, that an examination of the point will end in the conviction that Theocritus never saw the composition in question.] It is said he wrote some invectives against Hiero, king of Syracuse, who ordered him to be strangled. He also wrote a ludicrous poem, called Syrinx, and placed his verses in such order that they represented the pipe of the god Pan. The best editions of Theocritus are Warton's, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1770; that of Heinsius, 8vo. Oxon. 1699; that of Valkenaer, 8vo. L. Bat. 1781; that of Reiske, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1760; [and that of Kiessling, Lips. 1819, 8vo.] Quintil. .0, c. 1.—Laert. 5.—A Greek historian of Chios, who wrote an account of Libya. Plut.

THEODĀMAS, or THIODAMAS, a king of Mysia, in Asia Minor. He was killed by Hercules, because he refused to treat him and his son Hyllus with hospitality. Ovid. in Ib. v. 438.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 271.

THEODECTES, a Greek orator and poet of Phaselis in Pamphylia, son of Aristander and disciple of Isocrates. He wrote 50 tragedies besides other works now lost. He had such a happy memory that he could repeat with ease whatever verses were spoken in his presence. When Alexander passed through Phaselis he crowned with garlands the statue which had been erected to the memory of the deceased poet. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 24. in Orat. 51, &c.—Plut.—Quintil.

THEODONIS, a town of Germany, now Thionville, on the Moselle.

THEODORA, a daughter-in-law of the emperor Maximian, who married Constantius. —A woman, who from being a prostitute became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprizes. —The name of Theodora is common to the empresses of the east in a later period.

THEODORETUS, one of the Greek fathers who flourished A. D. 425. [He is the author of a history commencing A. D. 324, where that of Eusebius ends, and continued down to A. D. 429. The best edition is that of Reading, Cant. 1720, fol. Theodoret bears a high rank among the commentators on the Scriptures for the purity of his style. Occasionally, however, he abounds too much with metaphors. His work is rather deficient in chronological exactness, yet it contains many valuable documents, and some remarkable circumstances which other ecclesiastical historians have omitted.]

THEODORUS, a philosopher, disciple to Aristippus. He denied the existence of a God. He was banished from Cyrené, and fled to Athens, where the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus saved him from the accusations which were carried to the Areopagus against him. Some suppose that he was at last condemned to death for his impiety, and that he drank poison.—A consul in the reign of Honorius. Claudian wrote a poem upon him, in which he praises him with great liberality.—A man who compiled an history of Rome. Of this nothing but the history of the reigns of Constantine and Constantius is extant.—A player on the flute in the age of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who contemptuously rejected the favours of Lamia, the mistress of the monarch.—A Greek poet of Colophon, whose compositions are lost.—A Greek poet in the age of Cleopatra. He wrote a book of metamorphosis, which Ovid imitated, as some suppose.—An artist of Samos about 700 years B. C. He was the first who found out the art of melting iron, with which he made statues.—A Greek writer, called also Prodomus. The time in which he lived is unknown. There is a romance of his composition extant, called the amours of Rhodanthe and Dosicles. The only edition of which was by Gaulminus, 8vo. Paris, 1625.

THEODOSIA, now Caffa, a town [on the south-east side of the Tauric Chersonese.] Mela, 2, c. 1.

THEODOSIOPŌLIS, a town of Armenia, built by Theodosius. [It was situate east of Arze, on the river Araxes, and was a frontier town of the lower empire. It is now called Hasan-Cala, and otherwise Cali-cala, or the Beautiful Castle.]—[Another in Mesopotamia, on the river Chaboras. Its previous name was Resaina, and it was founded by a colony in the reign of Septimius Severus. The modern name Ras-ain is one of Arabic origin, and signifies the "fountain of a river," in allusion to the numerous springs which are here. The ancient name Resaina, is evidently of similar origin.]

THEODOSIUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, surnamed Magnus from the greatness of his exploits. He was invested with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eastern provinces, which had been in the possession of Valentinian. The first years of his reign were marked by different conquests over the Barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immense number of prisoners of both sexes were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they sued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with distant nations, who wished to gain the favours and the friendship of a prince whose military virtues were so conspicuous. Some conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but Theodosius totally disregarded them; and while he punished his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himself sufficiently secure in the love and the affection of his subjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the Barbarians, and restored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropsy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A. D. 395. His body was conveyed to Constantinople, and buried by his son Arcadius, in the tomb of Constantine. Theodosius was the last of the emperors who was the sole master of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius who succeeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodosius has been commended by ancient writers as a prince blessed with every virtue, and debased by no vicious propensity. Though master of the world, he was a stranger to that pride and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compassionate, and it was his wish to treat his subjects as he himself was treated when a private man and a dependent. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honour, and the emperor was fond of patronizing the cause of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of Christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and Christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed; and when the people of Thessalonica had unmeaningly, perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St. Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of soberness and temperance, his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation. He never indulged luxury or countenanced superfluities. He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire were of the most salutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zosim. 4, &c.—Ambros. Augustin. Claudian. &c.—The 2d, succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the eighth year of his age. He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honour. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides; without even a battle the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 29th of July, in the 49th year of his age. A. D. 450, leaving only one daughter, Licinia Eudoxia, whom he had married to the emperor Valentinian 3d. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs are well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprised him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him sign a paper, in which he delivered into her hands Eudoxia his wife as a slave and menial servant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial predecessors, have been called the Theodosian code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the Christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Sozom.—Socrates, &c.—A lover of Antonina, the wife of Belisarius. —[A mathematician of Tripoli, who flourished probably under the emperor Trajan, about A. D. 100. He wrote three books on the doctrine of the sphere, of which Ptolemy and succeeding writers availed themselves. They were translated by the Arabians into their own language from the Greek, and afterwards translated from the Arabic into Latin. The best edition is that of Hunt, 8vo. Oxon. 1707.]—A Roman general, father of Theodosius the Great; he died A. D. 376.

THEODÓTUS, a native of Chios, who, as preceptor and counsellor of Ptolemy, advised the feeble monarch to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæsar, but the resentment of the conqueror was such that the mean assassin fled, and after a wandering and miserable life in the cities of Asia, he was at last put to death by Brutus. Plut. in Brut. & Pomp.—A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B. C. 250.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet of Megara, who flourished about 549 years before Christ. He wrote several poems, of which only a few sentences are now extant, quoted by Plato, and other Greek historians and philosophers, and intended as precepts for the conduct of human life. The morals of the poet have been censured as neither decorous nor chaste. [Athenæus reckons him among the advocates for licentious pleasures, and Suidas refers to a work of his, entitled "Exhortations" or "Admonitions," containing various impurities. In the verses that now remain, nothing of this kind appears; so that if the charge be true, they have undergone castigation.] The best edition of Theognis, is that of Blackwall, 12mo. London, 1706. [They are best edited in the Poetæ Minores Græci, by Gaisford, Oxon. 1814-20, 4 vols. 8vo.]—There was also a tragic poet of the same name, whose compositions were so lifeless and unanimated that they procured him the name of Chion or snow.

THEOMNESTUS, a rival of Nicias in the administration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.—An Athenian philosopher, among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus, Cæsar's murderer, among his pupils.

THEOPHANE, a daughter of Bisaltus, whom Neptune changed into a sheep to remove her from her numerous suitors, and conveyed to the island Crumissa. The god afterwards assumed the shape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 177.—Hygin. fab. 183.

THEOPHĀNES, a Greek historian born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendship with the Roman general, his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharsalia, he advised Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. [Theophanes wrote a "History of the wars of the Romans in various countries, under the command of Pompey." Of this work their remain only a few fragments, quoted by Strabo, Plutarch, and Stobæus. Plutarch gives him a very unfavourable character for historic veracity.] Cic. pro Arch. & Patere.—Plut. in Cic. & Pomp.—His son, M. Pompeius Theophanes, was made governor of Asia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.—[A Byzantine historian. He was of a rich and noble family, and turned monk. When Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, was exiled by the emperor Leo, the Armenian, Theophanes paid him extraordinary honours, and was himself banished to the isle of Samothrace, where he died in 818. His Chronicle, beginning where that of Syncellus terminated, was extended to the commencement of the reign of Michael Curopalata. It is valuable for its facts, but displays the credulity and weak judgment of a superstitious mind. It was printed at Paris with a Latin version, and the notes of F. Goar, under the care of Combesis, in 1685, fol.]

THEOPHANIA, festivals celebrated at Delphi in honour of Apollo.

THEOPHILUS, a comic poet of Athens.—A physician, whose treatise de Urinis is best edited by Guidotius, L. Bat. 1728. [The best edition of another work of his, De Fabrica Hominis, is that by Morell, Paris, 1556, 8vo. Theophilus flourished under Heraclius about A. D. 630.]—[A bishop of Antioch, ordained to that see in 168 or 170 A. D. In his zeal against heresy he wrote against Marcion, and also against Hermogenes, and he composed other tracts, some of which are preserved. We have extant also three books against Autolytus. These works display, it is said, the earliest example of the use of the term "Trinity," as applied to the three persons of the Godhead. His work against Autolytus was published by Conrad Gesner, at Zurich, in 1546. It was annexed also to the Supplement of the Bibliotheca Patrum, in 1624.]—The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive Christians.

THEOPHRASTUS, a native of Eresus, in Lesbos, son of a fuller. He studied under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle, whose friendship he gained, and whose warmest commendations he deserved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philosopher made him exchange for that of Euphrastus, [the fine speaker,] to intimate his excellence in speaking, and afterwards for that of Theophrastus, [the divine speaker,] which he deemed still more expressive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that in a short time the number of his auditors was increased to two thousand. Not only his countrymen courted his applause, but kings and princes were desirous of his friendship; and Cassander and Ptolemy, two of the most powerful of the successors of Alexander, regarded him with more than usual partiality. [Among his pupils were, Nicomachus, the son of Aristotle, whom his father entrusted by will to his charge; Erasistratus, a celebrated physician, and Demetrius Phalereus, who resided with him in the same house. Under the archonship of Xenippus, in the year 305 B. C. Sophocles, the son of Amphiclide, obtained a decree, (upon what ground we are not informed) making it a capital offence for any philosopher to open a public school without an express licence from the senate. Upon this the philosophers all left the city. But the next year the person himself who had proposed this law was fined five talents, and the philosophers returned with great public applause.] Theophrastus composed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatises, which he wrote with great elegance and copiousness. [All that remain are, a treatise "On the Natural History of Plants and Fossils;" "Of Winds;" "Of Fire;" a rhetorical work entitled "Moral Characters;" and a few metaphysical fragments. His "Characters" are an excellent production, but the text is very corrupt: the Preface to the work is the production of some monkish writer, and is replete with erroneous and contradictory statements.] He died, loaded with years and infirmities, in the 107th year of his age, B. C. 288, lamenting the shortness of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the stag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Aristotle, which the dying philosopher intrusted to him. [vid. Aristotle, and Scepis.] The best editions of Theophrastus is that of Heinsius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his Characters, that of Casaubon, Bruns. 1659, 8vo; [that of Fischer, Coburg. 1763, 8vo; and that of Ast, Lips. 1816, 8vo.] The best edition of the works of Theophrastus now is that of Schneider, Lips. 1812, 4 vols. 8vo. There is a valuable edition of his treatise on Stones, with an English version and notes by Sir John Hill. Lond. 1777, 8vo.] Cic. Tusc. 3, c. 28, in Brut. c. 31, in Orat. 19, &c.—Strab. 13.—Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8, l. 34, c. 20, l. 8, c. 12.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. adv. colot.

THEOPŌLIS, a name given to Antioch because the Christians first received their name there.

THEOPOMPUS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ, who succeeded his father Nicander, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died after a long and peaceful reign, B. C. 723. While he sat on the throne the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 7.—A famous Greek historian of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B. C. 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as an historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Damastriatus. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lys.—C. Nep. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all lost.—A son of Demaratus, who obtained several crowns at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 10.—An orator and historian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Cæsar. Strab. 14.

THEOPHYLACTUS SIMOCATTA, a Byzantine historian. [His history of the reign of the emperor Maurice is comprehended in eight books, and terminates with the massacre of this prince and his children by Phocas. Casaubon reckons this writer one of the best of the later Greek historians. His history was published at Paris, in 1617, folio.] An edition of his epistles was given by Aldus.—One of the Greek fathers who flourished A. D. 1070. [Dupin observes that his Commentaries are very useful for the literal explanation of the Scriptures; and Dr. Lardner observes, that he quotes no forged writings or apocryphal books of the New Testament, many of which he excludes by his observation on John 1, 31-34, that Christ wrought no miracle in his infancy, or before the time of his public ministry.] His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

THEORIUS, a surname of Apollo at Træzene where he had a very ancient temple. It signifies clear-sighted.

THEOXENIA, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. Games were then observed, and the conqueror who obtained the prize received a large sum of money, or, according to others, a vest beautifully ornamented. The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

THEOXENIUS, a surname of Apollo.

THERA, one of the Sporades in the Ægean Sea, anciently called Callista, now Santorin. It was first inhabited by the Phœnicians, who were left there under Membliares by Cadmus, when he went in quest of his sister Europa. [Herodotus makes Membliares to have been a relation of Cadmus, but Pausanias represents him as a person of very mean origin.] It was called Thera by Theras, the son of Autesion, who settled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. [A colony from this island afterwards founded Cyrene in Africa. Pliny (N. H. 1, 236,) makes this island to have arisen from the sea in the 4th year of the 135th Olympiad.] Paus. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.—A town of Caria.

THERAMÈNES, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants of Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppression which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground, with the sarcastical exclamation of, This is to the health of Critias. This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Thersamenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Cothurnus, a part of the dress used both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib. &c.—C. Nep.

THERAPNE, or TERPNE, a town of Læconia, [south of Sparta,] and a short distance west of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It received its name from Terpne, a daughter of Lelex. Castor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they are sometimes called Therapnæi fratres. [Helen is also called Therapnæa virgo, from this the place of her birth.] Paus. 3, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 223.—Sil. 6, v. 303, l. 8, v. 414, l. 13, v. 43.—Liv 2, c. 16.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 49.—Stat. 7, Theb. v. 793.

THERAS, a son of Autesion of Lacedæmon, who conducted a colony to Calista, to which he gave the name of Thera. He received divine honours after death. Paus. 3, c. 1 and 15.

[THERASIA, a small rocky island in the Ægean, separated from the north-west coasts of Thera by a narrow channel. According to Pliny, it was detached from Thera by a convulsion of nature.]

THERMA, a town of Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, in honour of the wife of Cassander, and now Salonichi. [nd. Thessalonica.] The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermæus, or Thermaicus Sinus, and advances far into the country, so much that Pliny has named it Macedonicus Sinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

THERMÆ, (baths.) [This term is frequently used in connection with an adjective. Thus, Thermæ Selinuntia are the warm baths adjacent to the ancient Selinus, now Sciaccia.—Thermæ Himerenses, those adjacent to Himeræ on the northern coast of Sicily, now Termini, which has also become the modern name for the remains of the ancient city. So also in speaking of the warm baths constructed at Rome by various emperors, we read of the Thermæ of Dioclesian, &c.]

THERMÖDON, now Termah, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the ancient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine Sea near Themiscyra. [vid. Themiscyra.] There was also a small river of the same name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hæmon. Strab. 11.—Herodot. 9, c. 27.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Paus. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—*Virg. THERMOPYLÆ, a small pass leading from Thessaly into Locris, and Phocis, Bœotia, Attica, and the southern parts of Greece. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west part of the chain of Mount Oeta, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot springs which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B. C. 480, on the 7th of August, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to five millions. There was also another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. [Herodotus states that the total amount of the Grecian forces at Thermopylæ, prior to the battle, was 5,200; of whom 3,100 were Peloponnesians. According to Pausanias, the whole number was 11,200. Diodorus Siculus makes the entire Grecian strength 7,400, and the Peloponnesians, who were among these, 4,000 in number. Each of these writers estimates the Spartan forces at 300; while, according to the two former, the Tegeans amounted to 700, and, according to the latter, to 1,000. They all agree in stating the Thebans to have been 400 strong. On intelligence being received of the advance of the Persians in their rear, all the confederates were dismissed, except the Thespians and Thebans; the former insisted on staying, the latter were compelled by the Spartans to remain, being suspected of treachery. The Thebans went over to the Persians when they saw them victorious. The Thespians and the Spartans, except two, (vid. Leonidas,) gloriously perished. A good deal of uncertainty prevails, however, notwithstanding the explicit declaration of Herodotus, respecting the number of allies that remained with the Spartans after the rest were dismissed. Diodorus Siculus speaks only of the Thespians; Pausanias, however, says, that the people of Mycenæ sent 80 men to Thermopylæ, who had part in this glorious day; and in another place he states that all the allies retired before the battle, except the Thespians and people of Mycenæ. The springs, whence Thermopylæ received its ancient name, are about half way between Bodonitza and Zeitoun. They issue principally from two mouths at the foot of the limestone precipices of Oeta. The temperature, in the month of December, was found to be 111° of Fahrenheit. Dr. Holland found it to be 103° or 104° at the mouth of the fissures. The water is very transparent, but deposits a calcareous concretion (carbonate of lime,) which adheres to reeds and sticks, like the waters of the Anio at Tivoli, and the sulphureous lake between that place and Rome. A large extent of surface is covered with this deposit. It is impregnated with carbonic acid, lime, muriate of soda, and sulphur. The ground about the springs yields a hollow sound like that within the crater of the Solfaterra near Naples. In some places, Dr. Clarke observed cracks and fissures filled with stagnant water, through which a gaseous fluid was rising in large bubbles to the surface, its fetid smell bespeaking it to be sulphurated hydrogen. The springs are very copious, and immediately form several rapid streams running into the sea, which is apparently about a mile from the pass. Baths were built here by Herodes Atticus. The defile or strait continues for some distance beyond the hot springs, and then the road, which is still paved in many places, bears off all at once across the plain to Zeitoun, distant three hours from Thermopylæ. Near the springs there are faint traces of a wall and circular tower, composed of a thick mass of small stones, and apparently not of high antiquity. The foot of the mountain, however, Mr. Dodwell says, is so covered with trees and impenetrable bushes as to hide any vestiges which may exist of early fortifications. Herodotus says, that the wall built by the Phocians as a protection against the inroads of the Thessalians, was near the spring, and that it was formerly occupied by gates. This wall was subsequently repaired by the Greeks at the time of the Persian invasion; was at a later period renewed and fortified by Antiochus, when defending himself against the Romans; and lastly, was restored by Justinian, when that monarch sought to secure the tottering empire by fortresses and walls: he is stated also to have constructed cisterns here, for the reception of rain-water. The question is whether this be the site of the ancient wall, as Dr. Holland and Mr. Dodwell suppose, or whether the spring referred to by Herodotus be not the fountain mentioned by Dr. Clarke, who describes the wall, not as traversing the marsh, but as extending along the mountainous chain of Oeta, from sea to sea. The cisterns built by Justinian would hardly be in the marshy plain, but must be looked for within the fortified pass. The topography, however, of this part, requires to be more distinctly elucidated. Out of six celebrated rivers which discharge themselves into the sea in the vicinity of Thermopylæ, only three can at present be identified with any degree of certainty: these are the Boagrius, the Asopus, and the Sperchius. The other three were the Melas, the Dyra, and the Phœnix. "We know from Strabo," remarks Mr. Dodwell, "that all this coast has been greatly changed by the violent efforts of nature; and it is probable, that, since the time of the geographer, the features of the country have been undergoing a gradual but unremitting alteration. The marshes have gained considerably on the sea, while the rivers which discharge themselves into the Maliac Gulf, continually rolling great quantities of earth, have formed long, low projections to a considerable distance from their mouths. The intermediate pools are every day more choked with sand and mud, which, in process of time, will probably be converted into marshy ground, and afterwards into cultivated land. Even the Cenæum promontory may, in the course of ages, become united with the Thessalian shore.

—It is very probable, however, that a more accurate examination of the spot will show, that the accuracy of Herodotus and Strabo has been somewhat too hastily arraigned, and that the changes have been less considerable than the author represents. "It is certain," remarks Dr. Holland, "that, as far back as the time of Herodotus, a morass formed one of the boundaries of the pass, even in its narrowest part; and it appears from his account, that the Phocians had artificially increased this, by allowing the water from the hot springs to spread itself over the surface, with the view of rendering the passage yet more impracticable to their restless neighbours, the Thessalians. From the later description of Livy and Pausanias, it is probable, that, before their time, this swampy plain had extended itself, and become more nearly resembling its present state."—Formidable as this pass may seem, it has never opposed an effectual barrier to an invading army; the strength of these Gates of Greece being rendered vain by the other mountain routes which avoid them. "The Persians," says Procopius, "found only one path over the mountains: now, there are many, and large enough to admit a cart or chariot." A path was pointed out to Dr. Clarke, to the north of the hot springs, which is still used by the inhabitants in journeying to Salonâ. After following this path to a certain distance, another road branches from it towards the south-east, according to the route pursued by the Persians. Dr. Holland ascended Mount Oeta by "a route equally singular and interesting, but difficult, and not free from danger." When the Gauls under Brennus invaded Greece, the treacherous discovery made to him of a path through the mountains, compelled the Greeks to retreat, to prevent their being taken in rear. Antiochus was in like manner forced to retreat with precipitation, on seeing the heights above the pass occupied by Roman soldiers, who, under the command of M. Porcius Cato, had been sent round to seize these positions. In the reign of Justinian the army of the Huns advanced to Thermopylæ, and discovered the path over the mountains. When Bajazet entered Greece toward the close of the fourteenth century, there appears to have been little need of these artifices: a Greek bishop is stated to have conducted the Mohammedan conquerors through the Pass, to enslave his country. During the present revolution, Thermopylæ has never opposed any serious barrier against the progress of the Turkish forces. The passes of Callidromus and Cnemis were disputed on one occasion with success by a body of armatoles under Odysseus: but they have since been repeatedly suffered to cross the ridges of Othrys and Oeta without opposition.] Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Paus. 7, c. 15.

THERESEUS, king of Athens, and son of Ægeus, by Æthra, the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trœzene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. [vid. Ægeus.] His journey to Athens was not 'across the sea as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalize himself in going by land and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Trœzene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and rendered impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed

Corynetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procustes, and the celebrated Phæa. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial, Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground if Theseus was received into his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give this cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Pallantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus, but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this Theseus went to Crete among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread, and killed the Minotaur, [vid. Minotaurus,] he sailed from Crete with the six boys and seven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. [vid. Ægeus.] His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded. B. C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch intrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years, but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus; but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto redii passa timore. nihil. Some time after Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpiæ. Pluto, apprized of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone, on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment, repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Discite justitiam moniti, & non temere divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules, and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presents of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated with original solemnity in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose, that instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the place was called Cerberus; and hence perhaps arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape some time after, by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in vitâ.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 14 and 79.—Paus. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. THESMOPHORA, a surname of Ceres, as lawgiver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were free-born women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest called εσφρα σφραγος, because he carried a crown on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The free-born women were dressed in white robes to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity, and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus, fleabane, and all such herbs as were supposed to have the power of expelling all venereal propensities. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was, however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepsion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 14th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of high-priest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. [The two actors in the time of Thespiis did not both entertain the audience with "choral songs." Tragedy at first was nothing more than a song in honour of Bacchus, accompanied by gesticulations and dancing. In process of time were introduced relations of some mythological story, by a second person, who relieved the singer: this improvement was made by Thespiis. Afterwards another actor was added, who kept up a dialogue with the other performer. the singer introducing the Bacchic hymn between the different portions of the performance. This was the improvement of Æschylus. Sophocles added a third actor.] Horat. Art. P. 276.—Diog.

THESPIUS, a king of Thespia, in Bœotia, son of Erechtheus, according to some authors. He was desirous that his fifty daughters should have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which, according to some, was effected in one night, passes for the 13th and most arduous of the labours of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcanissima indicate:

All the daughters of Thespius brought male children into the world, and some of them twins, particularly Procris the eldest, and the youngest. Some suppose that one of the Thespiades refused to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to pass all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the priestess of a temple he had at Thespia. The children of the Thespiades, called Thespiadæ, went to Sardinia, where they made a settlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Thespius is often confounded by ancient authors with Thestius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, sent his sons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 9, c. 26 and 27.—Plut.

THESŒLIA, a country of Greece, whose boundaries have been different at different periods. [Properly speaking, Thessaly was bounded on the north by the chain of Olympus, separating it from Macedonia; on the west by that of Pindus, dividing it from Epirus; on the south by that of Oeta, parting it from Phocis and Ætolia; and on the east by the Ægean Sea.] It was generally divided into four separate provinces, Thessaliotis, Pelasgiotis, Istiæotis, and Phthiotis, to which some add Magnesia. It has been severally called Æmonia, Pelasgicum, Argos, Hellas, Argeia, Dryopis, Pelagias, Pyrrhæa, Æmathia, &c. [vid. Hellas and Hellenes.] As the Pelasgi returned after the Trojan war and re-possessed themselves of Thessaly, the name Hellas, at first exclusively applied to this country, ceased subsequently to have any reference whatever to it.] The name of Thessalia is derived from Thessalus, one of its monarchs. Thessaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. [vid. Deucalion.] Its mountains and cities are also celebrated, such as Olympus, Pelion, Ossa, Larissa, &c. The Argonauts were partly natives of Thessaly. The inhabitants of the country passed for a treacherous nation, so that false money was Thessalian coin, and a perfidious action Thessalian deceit. Thessaly was governed by kings, till it became subject to the Macedonian monarchs. [Thessaly abounded with a variety of plants, some of which were medicinal, and others poisonous. The knowledge of their different properties and uses caused the Thessalians to pass for a nation of sorcerers. The Thessalians are said to have been the first who managed horses with the bit, and used them in battles. Their cavalry were universally esteemed. The land is said to have been so rich that the corn grew too fast if it were not cut, or sheep turned in to graze upon it. THETIS, one of the sea-deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys, her grandmother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she should bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus, the son of Æacus, was permitted to solicit her hand. Thetis refused him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when asleep, and by binding her strongly, he prevented her from escaping from his grasp, in assuming different forms. When Thetis found that she could not elude the vigilance of her lover, she consented to marry him, though much against her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on Mount Pelion, with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddess of discord, who punished the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midst of the assembly a golden apple, to be given to the fairest of all the goddesses. (vid. Discordia.) Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless, he went with the rest of the Greeks. The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour; but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. THEUTIS, or TEUTHIS, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan War. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva, under the form of Melas, son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Paus. 8, c. 28.

THIA, the mother of the sun, moon, and

Aurora, by Hyperion. (vid. Thea.) Hesiod. Theog. v. 371.

THIMBRON, a Lacedæmonian, chosen general to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards re-appointed. He died B. C. 391. Diod. 17.

THISBE, a beautiful woman of Babylon. (vid. Pyramus.)—A town of Bœotia, between two mountains. Paus. 9, c. 32.

THOAS, a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. (vid. Iphigenia.) According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthænes. Ovid. Pont. 3, el. 2.—A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne the daughter of Minos, and husband of Myrine. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhadamantus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hypsipyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hypsipyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in Ib. 384.—Heroid. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. THOMYRIS, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomyris, was queen of the Massagetæ. After her husband's death, she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 143.

THORAX, a mountain near Magoesia in Ionia, where the grammarian Daphitas was suspended on a cross for his abusive language against kings and absolute princes, whence the proverb cave a Thorace. Strab. 14.—A Lacedæmonian officer who served under Lysander, and was put to death by the Ephorians. Plut. in Lys.

THORIA LEX, agraria, by Sp. Thorius, the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures. Cic. in Brut.

THORNAX, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Buphagus by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccygia, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckoo. Paus. 3, c. 27.

THOTH, an Egyptian deity, the same as Mercury.

THRÆCE, a daughter of Titan.—A name of Thrace. [vid. Thracia.]

THRÆCES, the inhabitants of Thrace. [vid. Thracia.]

THRÆCIA, a large country of Europe, lying to the east of Macedonia. [It was a barbarous country in the interior, but had many Greek colonies on the coast. The geography of this country is far from being well ascertained. It was separated from Macedonia by the Strymon and the ridges of Mount Pangæus and Mount Rhodope on the west, from Moesia by Mount Hæmus on the north, on the east was the Euxine, and on the south was the Ægean Sea.] The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation, they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleasures, and they sacrificed without the smallest humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace was barren as to its soil. It received its name from Thrax, the son of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The first inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and flesh of sheep. It forms now the province of Romania. Herodot. 4, c. 99, l. 5, c. 3.—Strab. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 9, c. 29, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 92, l. 13, v. 565, &c.—*C. THRÆSÆA, or THRÆSÆA PÆTUS, [a Roman senator in the reign of Nero, distinguished for his integrity and patriotism. He was a native of Patavium, educated in Stoical tenets, and a great admirer of Cato of Utica, whose life he wrote. His contempt of the base adulation of the senate, and his open and manly animadversions on the enormities of the emperor, were the occasion of his being condemned to death. He died A. D. 66, in the 13th year of Nero's reign. Tacitus says that Nero endeavoured to extirpate virtue itself by the destruction of Pæta and Soranus.] Juv. 5, v. 36.—Mart. 1, ep. 19.—Tacit. A. 15, c. 16.

THRASYBŪLUS, a famous general of Athens who began the expulsion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only assisted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B. C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive-branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtues of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasybulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power in the Ægean and on the coast of Asia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aspendus, whom his soldiers had plundered without his knowledge, B. C. 391. Diod. 14.—*C. THRASYLLUS, a man of Attica, so disordered in his mind that he believed all the ships which entered the Piræus to be his own. He was cured by means of his brother, whom he liberally reproached for depriving him of that happy illusion of mind. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 25.—[One of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Arginusæ, condemned to death with his colleagues, for omitting to collect and bury the dead after the action. vid. Arginusæ.]—A Greek Pythagorean philosopher and mathematician, who enjoyed the favours and the friendship of Augustus and Tiberius. Suet. in Tib.

THRASYMÆCHUS, a native of Carthage who became the pupil of Isocrates and of Plato. Though he was a public teacher at Athens, he starved for want of bread, and at last hung himself. Juv. 7, v. 204.

THRASYMÉNUS, a lake of Italy near Perugia, celebrated for a battle fought there between Annibal and the Romans under Flaminius, B. C. 217. No less than 15,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle, and 10,000 taken prisoners, or, according to Livy, 6,000, or Polybius, 15,000. The loss of Annibal was about 1,500 men. About 10,000 Romans made their escape, all covered with wounds. This lake is now called the lake of Perugia. [“The lake,” says Eustace, “is a very noble expanse of water, about ten miles in length and about seven in breadth. Three little islands rise in it, the largest and the least about a mile from the northern shore, the other near the southern extremity. The banks of the lake ascend gradually, but in some places rapidly, from its margin.”] Strab. 5.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 765.—Plut.

THŪCŪDĪDES, a celebrated Greek historian born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his ancestors he reckoned the great Miltiades. [He was born thirteen years after Herodotus, and forty years before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. This date has been preserved for us by Pamphila, a female author of the age of Nero, and by Aulus Gellius in his Noctes Atticæ. Thucydides has been sometimes confounded with one of the antagonists of Pericles, who bore the same name, but was the son of Milesias. It is said also, that being present in early youth at the Olympic games, when Herodotus read his history, he was so touched by the applause which the latter received as to burst into tears. This little anecdote, however, so creditable to Thucydides, appears very apocryphal. It is related indeed by the anonymous author of his life, but no preceding writer makes any mention of it.] His youth was distinguished by an eager desire to excel in the vigorous exercises and gymnastic amusements which called the attention of his cotemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponnesian war he has commissioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Brasidas, the Lacedæmonian general, defeated his operations, and Thucydides, unsuccessful in his expedition, was banished from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war. [It seems he had command of a fleet in this quarter. He saved, however, Elione, which was likewise threatened by the enemy. Being banished from Athens, he retired to Scapteyle in Thrace, where he possessed some mines in right of his wife. Here he remained twenty years, and began to write his history of the Peloponnesian war. He returned to Athens after it had been taken by Lysander. Pausanias says, however, that he was assassinated on the way; but he mistakes the date, for it appears from the history, that Thucydides survived the war.] This famous history is continued only to the 21st year of the war, and the remaining part of the time till the demolition of the walls of Athens, was described by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. [The history of Thucydides was interrupted by his death. The eighth and last book is imperfect and inferior to the rest, a circumstance which renders it probable that this portion of his work had not been revised by the historian previous to his death.] Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as possessed of more vigour, purity, elegance, and energy. [Thucydides is regarded as the canon, or perfection, of Atticism. Dionysius of Halicarnassus has been unjustly severe on his style. A justification of the historian, in this respect, has been attempted by Poppo, one of the late editors of the work. Among the Latin writers, Sallust and Tacitus appear to have taken Thucydides for their model.] He spared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furnished him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light on the different transactions of the war. The historian of Halicarnassus has been compared with the son of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetness of style, grace, and elegance of expression, may be called the characteristics of the former, while Thucydides stands unequalled for the fire of his description, the conciseness, and at the same time, the strong and energetic matter of his narrative. [The conciseness of Thucydides, however, sometimes degenerates into obscurity, particularly in his harangues: nor does he seem to be very solicitous about the elegance of his style or the purity of his language, but more ambitious to communicate information than to please the ear. Wholly engaged with his subject he is not anxious about the choice of words, or their nice collocation, nor does he even sometimes regard the strict rules of grammar in the ardour of composition. These defects, which some ignorantly admire, are counterbalanced by the justness and dignity of his sentiments, the fidelity and accuracy of his details, and the judicious reflections he constantly makes upon every plan that was proposed and every measure that was pursued. His speeches may be considered as the philosophical part of his history, as they develop the causes of events, the interests, motives, views, and principles of all the states engaged in that ruinous war, and bring these important points more into view than the detached reflections of modern historians. In the narration of great events he has seldom been equalled. The plague of Athens, the siege of Platæa, the sedition at Corcyra, the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, are painted in the most picturesque and forcible manner.] His relations are authentic, as he himself was interested in the events he mentions; his impartiality is indubitable, as he no where betrays the least resentment against his countrymen, and the factious partizans of Cleon, who had banished him from Athens. Many have blamed the historian for the injudicious distribution of his subject; and while, for the sake of accuracy, the whole is divided into summers and winters, the thread of the history is interrupted, the scene continually shifted; and the reader, unable to pursue events to the end, is transported from Persia to Peloponnesus, or from the walls of Syracuse to the coast of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been universally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly surpassed the original. The history of Thucydides was so admired, that Demosthenes, to perfect himself as an orator, transcribed it eight different times, and read it with such attention that he could almost repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 391 years before Christ. The best editions of Thucydides are those of Duker, fol. Amst. 1731; of Glasgow, 12mo. 8 vols. 1759; of Hudson, fol. Oxon. 1696; and the 8vo. of Bipont. 1738, 6 vols. [To these may be added the improved edition of Duker, by Gottleber and Bayer, Lips. 1790-1804, 2 vols. 4to; and that of Haackius, Lips. 1819, 3 vols. 8vo.] Cic. de Orat. &c.—Diod. 12.—Dionys. Hal. de Thuc.—*Elian. V. THURISTO, one of the deities of the Germans Tacit.

THULE, an island in the most northern parts of the German ocean, to which, on account of its great distance to the north, the ancients gave the epithet of ultima. Its situation was never accurately ascertained, hence its present name is unknown by modern historians. Some suppose that it is the island now called Iceland, or part of Greenland, whilst others imagine it to be one of the Shetland Isles. [The Thule mentioned by Tacitus in his life of Agricola, and which that commander discovered in circumnavigating Britain, coincides with Mainland, one of the Shetland Isles. The Thule spoken of by Pytheas, the ancient Greek navigator, was different from this. The relation of Pytheas is rather romantic in some of its features; as, for example, when he states that its climate was neither earth, air, nor sea, but a chaotic confusion of these three elements: from other parts of his narrative, however, many have been led to suppose that his Thule was modern Iceland or Norway. Mannert declares himself in favour of the former; D'Anville opposes it. Ptolemy places the middle of this Thule in 63° of latitude, and says that at the time of the equinoxes the days were 24 hours, which could not have been true at the equinoxes, but must have referred to the solstices, and therefore this island is supposed to have been in 66° 30' lat. that is, under the polar circle. The Thule of which Procopius speaks, D'Anville makes to correspond with the modern canton of Tylemar in Norway. The details of Procopius, however, seem to agree rather with the accounts that have been given of the state of ancient Lapland. Some modern geographers think that by Thule the ancients mean merely Scandinavia, of which their knowledge was very limited.] Stat. 3, Syl. 5, v. 20.—Strab. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 6.—*Tacit. THUSCIA, a country of Italy, the same as Etruria. [vid. Etruria.]

THYÄDES, (sing. THYAS) a name of the Bacchanals. They received it from Thyas, daughter of Castalius and mother of Delphus by Apollo. She was the first woman who was priestess of the god Bacchus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 302.—Paus. 10, c. 4.

THYÄMIS, a river of Epirus falling into the Ionian Sea. [Cicero's friend Atticus had a country-seat here, called Amaltheum, near Torone.] Paus. 1, c. 11.—Cic. 7, Att. 2.

THYATIRA, [a city of Lydia, near the northern confines, situate on the small river Lycus, not far from its source. According to Pliny, its original name was Pelopia; and Strabo makes it to have been founded by a colony of Macedonians. It was enlarged by Seleucus Nicator, and was selected as a place of arms by Andronicus, who declared himself heir to the kingdom of Pergamus after the death of Attalus. Thyatira, according to Strabo, belonged originally to Mysia; from the time of Pliny, however, we find it ascribed to Lydia. Its ruins are now called Ak-Hisar, or the white castle. This was one of the churches mentioned in the Revelations.] Liv. 37, c. 8 and 44.

THYESTES, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandson of Tantalus, debauched Ærope, the wife of his brother Atræus, because he refused to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no sooner known, than Atræus divorced Ærope, and banished Thyestes from his kingdom; but soon after, the more effectually to punish his infidelity, he expressed a wish to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyestes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was soon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atræus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the ancient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course not to be a spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atræus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atræus and married, and some time after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats; he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atræus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime Atræus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægypthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægypthus to examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægypthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægypthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Sophoc. in Ajax.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in Ib 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544, l. 7, v. 451.—Senec. in Thyest.

THYMBRA, a small town of Lydia, near Sardis, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between Cyrus and Cræsus, in which the latter was defeated. The troops of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, besides chariots, and those of Cræsus were twice as numerous.—A plain in Troas, through which a small river, called Thymbrius, falls in its course to the Scamander. THYMETES, a king of Athens, son of Oxinthus, the last of the descendants of Theseus, who reigned at Athens. He was deposed because he refused to accept a challenge sent by Xanthus, king of Bœotia, and was succeeded by a Messenian B. C. 1128, who repaired the honour of Athens by fighting the Bœotian king. Paus. 2, c. 18.—A Trojan prince whose wife and son were put to death by order of Priam. It was to revenge the king's cruelty that he persuaded his countrymen to bring the wooden horse within their city. He was son of Laomedon, according to some. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 32.—*Dictys. THYRSUS, a river of Sardinia, now Oristagni.

TIBERIAS, a town of Galilee, built by Herod, near a lake of the same name, and called after Tiberius. [The lake was previously called by the name of Gennesareth, from a pleasant district called Gennesar, at the northern extremity of the lake. Tiberias is often mentioned by the Jewish writers, because, after the taking of Jerusalem, there was at Tiberias a succession of Hebrew judges and doctors, till the fourth century. Epiphanius says that a Hebrew translation of St. John and the Acts of the Apostles was kept in this city.] Plin. 5, c. 16.—Joseph. A. 18, c. 3.

TIBERĪNUS, son of Capetas, and king of Alba, was drowned in the river Albula, which on that account assumed the name of Tiberis, of which he became the protecting god. Liv. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 20.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 389, l. 4, v. 47.

TIBĒRIS, Tyberis, Tiber, or Tibris, a river of Italy, on whose banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albula, from the whiteness of its waters, and afterwards Tiberis, when Tiberinus, king of Alba, had been drowned there. [It is probable that Albula was the Latin name of the river, and Tiberis or Tibris the Tuscan one. Varro informs us that a prince of the Veientes, named Dehebris, gave his name to the stream, and that out of this grew in time the appellations Tiberis and Tibris. It is often called by the Greeks Thymbriis, (ὁ Θουμβρις).] It was also named Tyrrhænus, because it watered Etruria, and Lydius because the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were supposed to be of Lydian origin. [vid. Etruria.] The Tiber rises in the Appenines, and falls into the Tyrrhene Sea 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. [vid. Ostia.] *Ovid. TIBĒRIUS, Claudius Drusus Nero, a Roman emperor after the death of Augustus, descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators, and he gained some applause in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His first appearance in the Roman armies was under Augustus, in the war against the Cantabri, and afterwards in the capacity of general he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midst of his glory, Tiberius fell under the displeasure of Augustus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for seven years as an exile, till, by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, assumed the reins of government; and while with dissimulation and affected modesty he wished to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greatest part of the Romans believe that he was invested with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Augustus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman senate. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the world; Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace, he was the friend of justice, and never assumed the sounding titles which must disgust a free nation; but he was satisfied to say of himself that he was the master of his slaves, the general of his soldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That seeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepest policy, soon disappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whose intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people, and suspected even by his most intimate favourites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were silenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign punishment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his successors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very existence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greatest deference to the senate; all libels against him he disregarded, and observed that in a free city, the thoughts and the tongue of every man should be free. The taxes were gradually lessened, and luxury restrained by the salutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a scene of peace and public tranquillity, the Barbarians were severally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honours by the activity and valour of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealousy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison, and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was scarce in Rome one single family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at last retired to the island of Caprea, on the coast of Campania, where he buried himself in unlawful pleasures. The care of the empire was intrusted to favourites, among whom Sejanus for a while shone with uncommon splendour. In this solitary retreat the emperor proposed rewards to such as invented new pleasures, or could produce fresh luxuries. He forgot his age as well as his dignity, and disgraced himself by the most unnatural vices and enormous indulgences which can draw a blush, even upon the countenance of the most debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was lost to himself and to the world the provinces were harassed on every side by the Barbarians, and Tiberius found himself insulted by those enemies whom hitherto he had seen fall prostrate at his feet with every mark of submissive adulation. At last, grown weak and helpless through infirmities, he thought of his approaching dissolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exist without a head, he nominated as his successor Caius Caligula. Many might inquire, why a youth naturally so vicious and abandoned as Caius was chosen to be the master of an extensive empire; but Tiberius wished his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be displayed in the reign of his successor, whose natural propensities he had well defined, in saying of Caligula that he bred a serpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the rest of the empire. Tiberius died at Misenum, the 16th of March, A. D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, six months, and 26 days. Caligula was accused of having hastened his end by suffocating him. The joy was universal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midst of sorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedless of the calamities which awaited them in the succeeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great solemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who seemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praises of Augustus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was universally esteemed; when he had no superior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favourite, he was tyrannical and dissolute. If, as some observe, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conspicuous as his great ancestors; but the sovereign power lodged in his hands rendered him vicious and oppressive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favoured flatter-

ry, he blushed at the mean servilities of the senate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he said, as if they approached a savage elephant. He was a patron of learning, he was an eloquent and ready speaker, and dedicated some part of his time to study. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, A complaint on the death of Lucius Cæsar, as also some Greek pieces in imitation of some of his favourite authors. He avoided all improper expressions, and all foreign words he totally wished to banish from the Latin tongue. As instances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Asia Minor, whose habitations had been destroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wished him to increase the taxes, No. said Tiberius, a good shepherd must shear, not slay his sheep. The senators wished to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Cæsar and Augustus, in the months of July and August; but this he refused, saying, What will you do, conscript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæsars? Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily observed by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual state of intoxication from the time he gave himself to drink till the last moment of his life. Sueton. in vitâ, &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.—Dion. Cass.—A friend of Julius Cæsar, whom he accompanied in the war of Alexandria. Tiberius forgot the favours he had received from his friend; and when he was assassinated, he wished all his murderers to be publicly rewarded.—One of the Gracchi. [vid. Gracchus.]—Sempronius, a son of Drusus and Livia, the sister of Germanicus, put to death by Caligula.—A son of Brutus, put to death by his father, because he had conspired with other young noblemen to restore Tarquin to his throne.—A Thracian made emperor of Rome in the latter ages of the empire.

TIBISCUS, now Teisse, a river of Dacia, with a town of the same name, now Temeswar. It falls into the Danube.

TIBRIS. [vid. Tiberis.]

TIBŪLA, a town of Sardinia, now Lango Sardo.

TIBULLUS, Aulus Albius, a Roman knight celebrated for his poetical compositions. [There exists some doubt respecting the period of his birth. Domitius Marsus, a contemporary poet, states expressly in an epigram which has come down to us, that Tibullus died at an early age, a short time after Virgil. It would seem, however, from other circumstances, that there is a strong probability of the poet's having attained the age of at least forty years.] He followed Messala Corvinus into the island of Corcyra, but he was soon dissatisfied with the toils of war; and, [having suffered severely by illness,] returned to Rome, where he gave himself up to literary ease, and to all the effeminate indolence of an Italian climate. His first composition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Messala, but his more favourite study was writing love-verses in praise of his mistresses Delia and Plautia, of Nemesis and Neæra, and in these elegant effusions he showed himself the most correct of the Roman poets. As he had espoused the cause of Brutus, he lost his possessions when the soldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them if he had condescended, like Virgil, to make his court to Augustus. [He seems to have been distinguished by no tokens of liberality from Augustus, or Mecænas, nor does he mention their names in his poems.] Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his composition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and possessed of so much grace and purity of sentiment, that the writer is deservedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. [The principal subjects of his poems are love and a rural life. "With his description of a passion which is illicit, he has blended," observes a writer, "more touches of a pure, and what may be termed a conjugal, affection than almost any other Roman poet. His language is a true example of what the Latins called terse, or neat and polished. He is easy and natural, with scarcely any mixture of learned allusion or figure."] Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age. Ovid has written a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally published with those of Propertius and Catullus, of which the best editions are, that of Vulpinus, Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754; and that by Heyne, 8vo. Lips. 1776. Ovid. 3, Am. el. 9.—Trist. 2, v. 447.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, l. 1, od. 33, v. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

TIBUR, an ancient town of the Sabines, about 18 miles north of Rome, built, as some say, by Tiburnus, the son of Amphiarus. [vid. Catillus.] It was watered by the Anio, and Hercules was the chief deity of the place; from which circumstance it has been called Herculei muri. In the neighbourhood, the Romans, on account of the salubrity of the air, had their several villas where they retired; and there also Horace had his favourite country-seat, though some place it nine miles higher. [Tibur is now called Tivoli. At this palace is the great cascade of the Anio.] Strab. 5.—Cic. 2, Orat. 65.—Suet. Cal. 21.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 630.—Horat. 3, od. 4, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 61, &c.

TIBURTUS, the founder of Tibur, which is often called Tiburta mænia. He was one of the sons of Amphiarus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 670.

TICHIS, now Tech, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean.

TICIDA, a Roman poet a few years before the age of Cicero, who wrote epigrams, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Perilla. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 433.

TICINUS, [now the Tesino, a river of Gallia Cisalpina, rising in the Lepontine Alps, near the sources of the Rhodanus, and falling into the Po near Ticinum. It traversed in its course the Lacus Verbanus, or Lago Maggiore. At the mouth of this river the Romans under Cornelius Scipio, the father of Scipio Africanus the elder, were defeated by Hannibal.] Ital. 4, v. 81.

TIFATA, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylo. 4.

TIFERNUM, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them for distinction's sake, is called Metaurense, near the Metaurus in Umbria; the other Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Samniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. sec. 4, ep. 1.

TIFERNUS, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 10, c. 30.—Mela. 3, c. 4.

TIGELLINUS, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to destroy himself, 68 A. D. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 72.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

TIGELLIUS, a native of Sardinia, who became the favourite of J. Cæsar, of Cleopatra, and Augustus, by his mimicry and facetiousness. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous disposition, and of unpleasing manners, as Horace, 1 Sat. 2, v. 3, and seq. insinuates.

TIGRANES, a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, and, by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was soon abated, and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near Mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him, he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, ensured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome for his insolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val. Max. 5, c. 1.—Pat. c. 2, c. 33 and 37.—Justin. 40, c. 1 and 2.—Plut. in Luc. Pomp. &c.—A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius. He was put to death. Tacit. 6, Ann. c. 40.—One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, chosen by Tiberius to ascend the throne of Armenia.—A man appointed king of Armenia by Nero. Tacit. A. 14, c. 26.

TIGRANOCERTA, now Sered, the capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes during the Mithridatic war. [It was situate to the east of the Tigris, on the river Nicephorius, and, according to Tacitus, stood on a hill nearly surrounded by the latter river. It was a large, rich, and powerful city.] Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immense riches, and no less than 8000 talents in ready money. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

TIGRIS, [a large river of Asia, rising in the mountains of Armenia Major, in the district of Sophene, and falling into the Euphrates. A rising ground prevents it from proceeding to the Euphrates in the early part of its course. A deep ravine in the mountains above Amida, or Diarbekir, opens a passage for it, and it takes its speedy course across a territory which is very unequal, and has a powerful declivity. Its extreme rapidity, the natural effect of local circumstances, has procured for it the name of Tigr in the Median language, Diglito in Arabic, and Hiddekel in Hebrew; all which terms denote the flight of an arrow. Besides this branch, which is best known to the moderns, Pliny has described to us in detail another, which issues from a chain of mountains, now the mountains of Kurdistan, to the west of the Arsissa Palus, or Lake of Van. It passes by the lake Arethusa. Its course being checked by a part of Mount Taurus, it falls into a subterranean cavern called Zoroander, and appears again at the bottom of the mountain. The identity of its waters is shown by the reappearance of light bodies at its issue, that have been thrown into it above the place where it enters the mountains. It passes also by the lake Thospitis, near Arzanene, or Erzen, buries itself again in subterranean caverns, and re-appears at the distance of 25 miles below, near Nymphæum. This branch joins the western Tigris. As the Tigris and Euphrates approach, the intermediate land loses its elevation, and is occupied by meadows and morasses. Several artificial communications, perhaps two or three which are natural, form a prelude to the approaching junction of the rivers, which finally takes place near the modern Koma. The river formed by their junction was called Pasitigris, now Shat-el-Arab, or the river of Arabia. It has three principal mouths, besides a small outlet: these occupy a space of 36 miles. For farther particulars vid. Euphrates. The Tigris, though a far less noble stream than the Euphrates, is one of the most celebrated rivers in history, and many famous cities, at various periods, have decorated its banks; among these may be mentioned Nineveh, Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and, in modern times, Bagdad, Mousul, Di- arbekir. The length of the Tigris is 800 miles.] Plin. 6, c. 27.—Justin. 42, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 256.

TIMACUS, [now the Timok, a river of Mœsia falling into the Danube.]

TIMÆA, the wife of Agis, king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades by whom she had a son. The child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

TIMÆUS, a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.—An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 262 B. C. and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in Nic.—Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.—A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.—A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locris. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world, in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato. in Tim.—Plut.—A sophist, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platoniarum. [It was edited with great ability by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1754, 8vo.]

TIMAGÈNES, a Greek historian of Alexandria, 54 B. C. brought to Rome by Gabinus, and sold as a slave to the son of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favours of the great, and of Augustus. The emperor discarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himself on his patron, burnt the interesting history which he had composed of his reign. Plut.—Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.—Quintil.—A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 5

TIMAGÓRAS, an Athenian, capably punished for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Suidas.—Another. (vid. Meles.) TIMANDRIDES, a Spartan, celebrated for his virtues. Ælian. V. H 14, c. 32.

TIMANTHES, a painter of Sicyon, in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointment could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. [In his sleeping Cyclops, exhibited in a small tablet, he introduced Satyrs measuring his thumb with a thyrsus, in order to give an idea of the magnitude of the principal figure.] Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.—An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himself when he perceived that his strength began to fail. Paus. 6, c. 8.

TIMASITHEUS, a commander of the Liparean pirates, who obliged them to spare some Romans taken by them, when going to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipara, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

TIMAVUS, a broad river of Italy, [north-east of Aquileia,] rising from a mountain, and after running a short space, falling into the Adriatic Sea. There are at the mouth of the Timavus small islands with hot springs of water. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 6. JEn. 1, v. 44 and 248.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

TIMOCLEA, a Theban lady, sister to Theagenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

TIMÓCLES, two Greek poets of Athens, who wrote some theatrical pieces, the one 6, and the other 11, some verses of which are extant. Athen. 6.

TIMOCRATES, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.

TIMOCREON, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Christ, distinguished for his veracity and his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

*Multa bibens, & multa vorans, mala denique

Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

TIMOLEÓN, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to kill his own brother Timophanes when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. Timoleon, says he, if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer. This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse in ten ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Ictas, who had the possession of the city, was defeated, and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himself up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily; many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection, and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Ictas and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall. Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for a thousand talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury. When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced, and banished from the island. A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown every where to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse; his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression, he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemy, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabbed by an unknown person, who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was mean time pursued, and when he was found, he declared, that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Inquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse about 37 years before the Christian era. His body received an honourable burial in a public place called from him Timoleonterum; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret than the institution of festivals, and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. C. Nep. & Plut. in vitâ. — Polyæn. 5, c. 3. — Diod. 16.

TIMOMACHUS, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. His painting of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for 80 talents by J. Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, c. 11.

TIMON, a native of Athens, called Misanthrope, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and all society. He was fond of Apemantus, another Athenian, whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen that he had a fig-tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut. in Alc. &c. — Lucian. in Tim. — Paus. 6, c. 12.—A Greek poet, son of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age.—[A disciple of Pyrrho, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and lived to the age of 90 years. He first professed philosophy at Chalcedon, and afterwards at Athens, where he remained till his death. He took little pains to invite disciples to his school, and seems to have treated the opinions and disputes of the philosophers with contempt; for he wrote a poem, called Silli, in which he inveighs with bitter sarcasm against the whole body. He was addicted to intemperance. With him terminated the succession of the public professors in the school of Pyrrho. The remaining fragments of his poem have been collected by H. Stephens in his "Poesis Philosophica."] Diog. — Athen. 6 and 13.

TIMOPHĀNES, a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.

TIMOTHEUS, a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people, and further applications would have been totally abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. [According to Pausanias he perfected the cithara, by the addition of four new strings to the seven which it had before. Suidas, however, states that it had nine before, and that Timotheus only added two.] There was also another musician of Bœotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. [This is the famous flute-player whose performance animated the prince so powerfully that he seized his arms, and who was employed by him, together with the other great musicians of his time, in the celebration of his nuptials.] *Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 15.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—Plut. de music. de fort. &c.—An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalized himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treasury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the ancients, to intimate his continual success, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. *Athen. 10, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 29.—Plut. in Syll. &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 10 and 18, l. 3, c. 16.—C. Nep.

TINGIS, now Tingier, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he caused it to be opened, and found in it a skeleton six cubits long. This increased the veneration of the people for their founder. [Some editions of Plutarch read ἕξκοινα (60) instead of ἕξ (6). The latter, however, is decidedly the true reading. Plutarch copies here, according to Strabo, the fable of Gabinius respecting the stature of Antæus.] Plut. in Sert.—Mela, 1, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 1.—Sil. 3, v.

TIPHYS, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. *Orph.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Apollon.—Val. TIRÆSIAS, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his sons, sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents in the act of copulation on Mount Cyllene, and that when he had struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias, had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision a dispute in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received, was ten times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eye-sight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c. who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on Mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated; but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eye-sight. During his lifetime Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity, with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on Mount Tilphussus, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—Theocrit. Id. 24, v. 70.—*Stat. TIRO, Tullius, a freed-man of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented short hand-writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero, and other treatises now lost. Cic. ad Att. &c.

TIRYNTHIA, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tirynthus. Ovid. Met. 6.

TIRYNTHUS, a town of Argolis in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tiryns, son of Argos. Hercules generally resided there, whence he is called Tirynthius heros. [Mr Gell, in his Itinerary, corrects an error of D'Anville with regard to this place. We shall give his own words: "A mistake occurs in the map of D'Anville on the subject of Tiryns, and a place named by him Vathia, but of which nothing can be understood. It is possible that Vathi, or the profound valley, may be a name sometimes used for the valley of Barbitas, and that the valley named by D'Anville Claustra, may be the outlet of that valley called Kleisoura, which had a corresponding signification. The city of Tiryns is also placed in D'Anville's map in two different positions, once by its Greek name, and again as Tirynthus." Gell's Itinerary, p. 169.] Paus. 2, c. 16, 15 and 49.—*Virg. TISAMĒNES, or TISAMĒNUS, a son of Orestes and Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and obliged him to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 3, c. 1, l. 7, c. 1.—A king of Thebes, son of Thersander, and grandson of Polynices. [TISDRUS. vid. TYSARUS]

TISIPHONE, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, who visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 59.—*Virg. TISSAMĒNUS. [vid. Tisamenus.]

TISSAPHERNES, a satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa, against Cyrus. It was as a recompence for his great services, especially after the battle, that he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B. C. C. Nep.

TITĒA, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITĀNUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. [vid. the end of the article Titanes.] He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers, the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on his throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus, &c. have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian; to the sun by Virgil and Ovid; and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 4, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 11.—*Orpheus. TITĀNA, a town of Sicyonia in Peloponnesus. Titanus reigned there.

TITĀNES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. [vid. the end of this article.] They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus 6, and Hesiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom some add Typhæus, Mimas, Porphyryon, Rheetus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them against their father. Saturn, with a scythe cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity, called Venus; as also Aleto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. [Pezron, in his "Antiquity of the Celtæ," makes that people to be the same with the Titans, and their princes the same with the giants in Scripture. According to him the Titans were the descendants of Gomer, the son of Japhet. He adds, that the word Titan is perfect Celtic, and he derives it from tit, "earth," and den or ten, "man;" and hence he says the reason of the Greek appellation of γηγενες, or "earth born," which was applied to them. The Titans, according to Bryant, were those Cuthites, or sons of Chus, called giants, who built the tower of Babel, and were afterwards dispersed. Many other explanations of this ancient fable might be given, but all equally wild and improbable.] *Hesiod. TITANIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as grand-daughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 395, l. 2, &c.

TITANIDES, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra, reduced in number to six, according to Orpheus. The most celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemosynè, Ops, Cybele, Vesta, Phœbe, and Rhea. Hesiod. Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

TITARÆSUS, a river of Thessaly, called also Eurotas, flowing into the Peneus, but without mingling its thick and turbid waters with the transparent stream. From the unwholesomeness of its water, it was considered as deriving its source from the Styx. Lucan. 6, v. 376.—Homer. Il. 2, en. 258.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 18.

TITHENIDIA, a festival of Sparta, in which nurses, τειθαι, conveyed male infants intrusted to their charge to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs. During the time of their solemnity, they generally danced and exposed themselves in ridiculous postures; there were also some entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a separate portion allotted him, together with a small loaf, a piece of new cheese, part of the entrails of the victims, and figs, beans, and green vetches instead of sweet-meats.

TITHONUS, a son of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmation. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it; but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty, which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm, and decrepid; and as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. [Tithonus, according to some of the ancient writers, was the founder of Susa; others ascribe its erection to Memnon. vid. Memnonium.] Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447.—Æn. 4, v. 585, l. 8, v. 384.—Hesiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 461, l. 9, v. 403.—Horat. 1. Od. 27, l. 2. Od. 16.

TITH-REA, [a city situate on Mount Parnassus in Phocis. (vid. Parnassus). Delphi and Tithorea on different sides of the mountain, were the halting-places of those passing over Parnassus, at the distance of 90 stadia from each other; being situate as the towns of Aoste in Piedmont, and Martinach in the Vallais, are with regard to Mount St. Bernard. The whole district on the southern side was the Delphic; while all the country on the northern side received its name from Tithorea. The olives of this city were so highly esteemed, that they were conveyed as presents to the Roman emperors: they still maintain their ancient reputation, being sent as an acceptable offering to the pashas and other grandees of Turkey. It is now called Velitza or (Belutza.)] Herodot. 3, c. 32.

TITHRAUSTES, a Persian satrap, B. C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimon.—An officer in the Persian court, &c. The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. *Plut.—C. TITIA LEX de magistratibus, by P. Titius, the tribune, A. U. C. 710. It ordained that the triumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus.—Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial questors, like the consuls and prætors, should receive their provinces by lot.

TITIANA FLAVIA, the wife of the emperor Pertinax, disgraced herself by her debaucheries and incontinence. After the murder of her husband she was reduced to poverty, and spent the rest of her life in an obscure retreat.

TITIANUS, Attil, a noble Roman put to death A. D. 156, by the senate for aspiring to the purple. He was the only one proscribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.

TITII, priests of Apollo at Rome, who observed the flight of doves and drew omens from it. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 15.—Lucan. 1, v. 602.

TITINIUS, a friend of Cassius, who killed himself.—One of the slaves who revolted at Capua. He betrayed his trust to the Roman generals.

TITUS PROCULUS, a tribune of the people who enacted the Titian law.—One of Pompey's murderers.—Septimius, a poet in the Augustan age, who distinguished himself by his lyric and tragic compositions, now lost. Ho. at. 1, ep. 3, v. 9.

TITORMUS, a shepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious strength. He was stronger than his contemporary, Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his shoulders a stone which the Crotonian moved but with difficulty. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 22.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

TITUS VESPASIANUS, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 79th year of the Christian era, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence, his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute, and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. From such a private character, which still might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppression? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wish to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his usual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne, he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is, perhaps, the only monarch who, when invested with uncontrollable power, bade adieu to those vices, those luxuries, and indulgencies, which, as a private man, he never ceased to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refused the donations which were due to sovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and magnificent than Titus. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the sight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the sudden appearance of 5000 wild beasts brought into the circus for their amusement. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of My friends, I have lost a day! A continual wish to be benevolent and kind made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could say that he had rather die himself than be the cause of the destruction of one of his subjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts, he made them his friends by kindness, and like another Nerva, presented them with a sword, to destroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties, and, as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of a magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission complained of the severity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 20 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themselves as deprived of the most benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotion, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exercised against the Jews, but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph. B. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Suetonius.—Dio. &c.

TITUS TATIUS, a king of the Sabines. [vid. Tattius.]—LIVIVS, a celebrated historian. [vid. Livius.]—A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.

TITYRUS, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.—A large mountain of Crete.

TITYUS, a celebrated giant, son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara, the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Eubœa. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. Pyth. 4.—*Homer. TLÉPÔLĒMUS, a son of Hercules and Astyocheia, born at Argos. He left his native country after the accidental murder of Lycymnius, and retired to Rhodes, by order of the oracle, where he was chosen king as being one of the sons of Hercules. He went to the Trojan war with nine ships, and was killed by Sarpedon. There were some festivals established at Rhodes in his honour, called Tlepoletmia, in which men and boys contended. The victors were rewarded with poplar crowns. Homer. Il.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Hygin. fab. 97.

TMARUS, a mountain of Thesprotia, called Tomarus by Pliny.

TMOIUS, a king of Lydia, who married Omphale, and was son of Sipyllus and Chthonia. He offered violence to a young nymph called Ariphe, at the foot of Diana's altar, for which impiety he was afterwards killed by a bull. The mountain on which he was buried bore his name. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 4.—Hygin. fab. 191.—A town of Asia Minor, destroyed by an earthquake.—A mountain of Lydia, now [Bour-dag, or the cold mountain,] on which the river Pactolus rises. [vid. Taurus.] The air was so wholesome near Tmolus, that the inhabitants generally were remarkable for their longevity. The neighbouring country was very fertile, and produced plenty of vines, saffron, and odoriferous flowers. Strab. 13, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 84, &c.—Ovid. Met. 2, &c.—Sil. 7, v. 210.—*Virg. TOGATA, an epithet applied to a certain part of Gaul where the inhabitants are dis-

TOLENUS, a river of Latium, now Salto, falling into the Velinus. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 561.

TOLETUM, now Toledo, a town of Spain on the Tagus. [It belonged to the Carpetani. According to Sylva, and other Spanish historians, this city was founded by a considerable body of Jews, who, on their emancipation from captivity 540 years before the vulgar era, established themselves here, and called the place Toledoth or Toledath, that is, "mother of the people." This is all a mere fable. Cæsar made this city a place of arms, and Augustus rendered it one of the seats of justice in Spain. Modern Toledo was formerly celebrated for the exquisite temper of its sword-blades, for which, according to some of the ancient writers, Toletum was also famous.]

TOIΣTOBOI, a people of Galatia in Asia, descended from the Boii of Gaul. [vid. Teetosages.] Plin. 5, c. 32.—Liv. 58, c. 15 and 16.

TOLŒSA, now Toulouse, the capital of Languedoc, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was afterwards celebrated for the cultivation of the sciences. [The situation of Tolosa was very favourable for trade, and under the Romans it became the centre of the traffic which was carried on between the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts of this part of Gaul.] Minerva had here a rich temple, which Cæpio the consul plundered, and as he was never after fortunate, the words aurum Tolosanum became proverbial. [Cæpio is said to have plundered 15,000 talents. This wealth seems to have belonged for the most part to private individuals, who had placed it in the temple for safe keeping.] *Cæs. bell. TOLUMNUS, a king of Veni, killed by Cor. Cossus, after he had ordered the ambassadors of Rome to be assassinated. Liv. 4, c. 19.

TOLUS, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

TOMARUS. [vid. Tmarus.]

TOMOS, or TOMIS, a town situate on the western shores of the Euxine Sea, about 36 miles from the mouth of the Danube. The word is derived from τεμνω, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. [The name more probably was one of Celtic origin. Tomi is still called Tomesivar, though sometimes otherwise styled Baba.] It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus. Tomos was the capital of lower Mœsia, founded by a Milesian colony, B. C. 633. Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 4, v. 59.—Trist. 3, el. 9, v. 33, &c.

TOMYRIS. [vid. Thomyris.]

TONEA, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the seashore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple. This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

TOPAZOS, an island in the Arabian Gulf, anciently called Ophiodes, from the quantity of serpents that were there. The valuable stone called topaz was found there. [The topaz of the Romans was the modern Chrysolite, a stone which has always an admixture of green with the yellow. This probably proceeds from particles of copper dissolved in an acid, and taken up with those of the lead into the matter of the gem at the time of its original concretion.] Plin. 6, c. 20.

TORONE, a town of Macedonia, [near the southern extremity of the promontory of Sithonia; and giving name to the Sinus Toronaicus, or Gulf of Cassandria.] Liv. 31, c. 45.—Of Epirus, [below the river Thyamis, and opposite to Corcyra. Its more correct name was Toryne,] which signifies in Greek, a ladle, (τρογγυνη.) It was seized upon by Augustus, previous to the battle of Actium. Cleopatra, to remove the distress which the loss of this place occasioned to Antony, asked him with an air of pleasantry, if it was so dreadful a thing that Cæsar was got into the ladle. Plut. in Ant.

TORQUATA, one of the vestal virgins, daughter of C. Silanus. She was a vestal for 64 years. Tacit. 3, An. c. 69.

TORQUATUS, a surname of Titus Manlius. [vid. Manlius.]

TORYNE. [vid. Torone.]

TOXARIDIA, a festival at Athens, in honour of Toxaris, a Scythian hero who died there.

Q. TRABEA, a comic poet at Rome in the age of Regulus. Some fragments of his poetry remain. Cic. in Tusc. 4, c. 31. Fin. 2, c. 4.

TRACHÆLUS, M. Galerius, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect. Quintil.—Tacit.

[TRACHIS or TRACHINIA, called also Thracinia Heraclea, a district and town of Thessaly on the Sinus Maliacus, north of the Asopus. It was the scene of the tragedy of Sophocles, on the death of Hercules, who burnt himself on a funeral-pile raised on the neighbouring Mount Oeta. The modern Zeiton is supposed to correspond with the ancient Trachinia. The Sinus Maliacus is now the Gulf of Zeiton.] Strab. 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 269.

TRAGURUM, a town of Dalmatia on the sea.

TRAJANOPOLIS, a town of Thrace, [on the Hebrus, below its confluence with the Zerna.]—A name given to Selinus of Cilicia, where Trajan died.

TRAJANUS, M. Ulpius Crinitus, a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his services to the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a consul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who solemnly adopted him as his son, invested him during his lifetime with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Cæsar and of Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany and the banks of the Danube. The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodness of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions; and the new emperor seemed calculated to ensure peace and domestic tranquillity to the extensive empire of Rome. All the actions of Trajan showed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The Barbarians continued quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor, whose military abilities they distrusted, were now few. Trajan, however, could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern, the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers awed the Barbarians to peace; but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge across the rapid streams of the Danube, and a battle was fought, in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus, despairing of success, destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardour of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the east, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and by his well-directed operations made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. He extended his conquests in the east, he obtained victories over unknown nations, and when on the extremities of India, he lamented that he possessed not the vigour and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. These successes in different parts of the world gained applause, and the senators were profuse in the honours they decreed to the conqueror. This, however, was but the blaze of transient glory. Trajan had no sooner signified his intentions of returning to Italy than the conquered Barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman empire did not acquire one single acre of territory from the conquests of her sovereign in the east. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition; he stopped in Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was seized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of August, A. D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, six months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was succeeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empress Plotina introduced to the Roman armies as the adopted son of her husband. The ashes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and deposited under the stately column which he had erected a few years before. Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment supposed that their prosperity was complete under a good and virtuous sovereign. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The sounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily bestowed upon a prince who was equal to the greatest generals of antiquity, and who, to indicate his affability, and his wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of the public palace. Like other emperors, he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but rose from his seat and went cordially to salute them. He refused the statues which the flattery of favourites wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people; he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade and ostentatious equipage. When in his camp, he exposed himself to the fatigues of war like the meanest soldier, and crossed the most barren deserts and extensive plains on foot, and in his dress and food displayed all the simplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldest soldiers he knew by their own names, he conversed with them with great familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had visited the camp, and by a personal attendance convinced himself of the vigilance and the security of his army. As a friend, he was not less distinguished than as a general. He had a select number of intimates, whom he visited with freedom and openness, and at whose tables he partook many a moderate repast without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was, perhaps, carried to excess. His favourite Sura had once been accused of attempts upon his life, but Trajan disregarded the informer, and as he was that same day invited to the house of the supposed conspirator, he went thither early. To try farther the sincerity of Sura, he ordered himself to be shaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his surgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are also celebrated; he opened free and easy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furnished Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was in his reign that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column. It was erected in the middle of Trajan's forum, and dedicated to him by the senate and people to commemorate his Dacian victories. Its height, including the statue, is 132 feet. His persecutions of the Christians were stopped by the interference of the humane Pliny, but he was unusually severe upon the Jews, who had barbarously murdered 200,000 of his subjects, and even fed upon the flesh of the dead. His vices have been obscurely seen through a reign of continued splendour and popularity, yet he is accused of incontinence and many unnatural indulgencies. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wish to be styled lord has been censured by those who admired the moderation and the modest claims of an Augustus. *Plin. paneg. &c.—Dio. TRAPÆZUS, a city of Pontus, built by the people of Sinope. [Its ancient name was derived from the square form in which the city was laid out, resembling a table, (τραπέζα.) Trapezus is celebrated for the hospitable reception which its inhabitants gave to the 10,000 Greeks on their retreat, this being the first Greek colony which the latter had reached after the battle of Cunaxa. It fell subsequently into the hands of the Romans, but was taken from them by the Scythians or Tartars in the reign of Valerian. The Greek emperors became afterwards masters of it. A separate dynasty was here established, commencing with Alexias Comnenes in 1204, which ended with the capture of the city by Mahomet 2d in 1462. The princes who reigned in this city are the Greek emperors of whom so much mention is made in romances and so little in history: they must not be confounded with the imperial line at

TRIBUNI PLEBIS, magistrates at Rome, created in the year U. C. 261, when the people, after a quarrel with the senators, had retired to Mons Sacer. The two first were C. Licinius, and L. Albius. [These created three colleagues. In the year 283, they were first elected at the Comitia Tributa, and in A. U. C. 297, ten tribunes were created, two out of each class, which number continued ever after. The name of Tribunes was given to them, according to Varro, because they were first chosen from the tribunes of the soldiers.] Their office was annual, and as the first had been created on the 10th of December, that day was ever after chosen for the election. Their power, though at first small, and granted by the patricians to appease the momentary seditions of the populace, soon became formidable, and the senators repented too late of having consented to elect magistrates, who not only preserved the rights of the people, but could summon assemblies, propose laws, stop the consultations of the senate, and even abolish their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was also necessary to confirm the senatus consulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T under it. If any irregularity happened in the state, their power was almost absolute; they criticized the conduct of all the public magistrates, and even dragged a consul to prison if the measures he pursued were hostile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their superior; but when that magistrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magistrates, abolished while he continued at the head of the state. [It was one of the peculiar privileges connected with the office of tribune that their persons should be held sacred, (sacrosancti); and any one, therefore, who hurt a tribune in word or deed, was held accursed, and his goods were confiscated. Under the sanction of this law they carried their power to an extravagant height. By the Iclian law also it was forbidden, under the severest penalties, to interrupt a tribune while speaking, and no one was allowed to speak in the assemblies summoned by them without their permission.] The marks by which they were distinguished from other magistrates were not very conspicuous. They wore no particular dress, only a beadle, called viator, marched before them. [At first they were not allowed seats in the senate, but sat on benches without, and the decrees of that body were brought to them for their approval or rejection; they were soon, however, admitted within.] Yet great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number, and as their consultations and resolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the senate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they, as it were, suspended the authority of the rest. The office of tribune of the people, though at first deemed mean and servile, was afterwards one of the first steps that led to more honourable employments; and as no patrician was permitted to canvass for the tribuneship, we find many that descended among the plebeians to exercise that important office. [As no patrician could be made tribune without being first adopted in a plebeian family, we find Clodius, the enemy of Cicero, submitting to this form, for the purpose of exercising the whole power of the Tribunitian office against the orator. No one, moreover, could be made tribune or plebeian ædile, whose father had borne a curule office and was alive, nor whose father was a captive.] From the power with which they were at last invested by the activity, the intrigues, and continual applications of those who were in office, they became almost absolute in the state, and it has been properly observed, that they caused far greater troubles than those which they were at first created to silence. Sylla, when raised to the dictatorship, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes, and by one of his decrees, they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people; they could make no laws; no appeal lay to their tribunals, and such as had been tribunes were not permitted to solicit for the other offices of the state. This disgrace, however, was but momentary; at the death of the tyrant the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the Great. [In the consulship of the former, they obtained the right of enjoying other offices, and in the consulship of Pompey and Crassus, all their former powers, a thing which Cæsar strenuously promoted. The tribunes henceforth were employed by the leading men as the tools of their ambition. Backed by a hired mob, they determined every thing by force; they made and abrogated laws at pleasure, and in fine threw the whole state into utter confusion. Julius Cæsar, who had been the principal cause of their excesses, and had made the violation of their power a pretext for taking up arms, having at last become absolute, reduced the tribunitian power to a mere name, and deprived the tribunes of their office at pleasure. Augustus got the tribunitian power conferred upon himself by a decree of the senate. This power gave him the right of holding the senate, of assembling the people, and of being appealed to in all cases. It also rendered his person sacred and inviolable, so that it became a capital crime to injure him in word or deed; which, under the succeeding emperors, served as a pretext for cutting off numbers of the chief men of the state. Hence this among other powers used to be conferred on the emperors in the beginning of their reign, or upon other solemn occasions; and hence also the years of their government were called the years of their tribunitian power, which are often found marked on ancient coins, computed most generally from the commencement of their reign.] Under Constantine the tribuneship was totally abolished. The tribunes were never permitted to remain all night in the country, nor to be above one whole day out of town, except at the Feria Latina, when they went with other magistrates to offer sacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houses were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redress the wrongs of their constituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city. [When, however, they were sent by the senate and people, they might, in any part of the empire, seize even a proconsul at the head of his army and bring him to Rome.]—There were also other officers who bore the name of tribunes, such as the tribuni militum or militares, who commanded a division of the legions, [ten centuries, or about 1000 men. They commanded each in turn, usually a month about.] They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might arise in the army, they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at first chosen by Romulus, but the number was at last increased to six in every legion. After the expulsion of the Tarquins, they were chosen by the consuls, but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the consul. [The people, after

A. U. C. 393, usually appointed six annually, out of twenty-four. Afterwards the manner of choosing them varied. By the Atinian law the people claimed to themselves the right of choosing sixteen for four legions, or sixteen out of twenty-four, that is, two thirds of the whole. Those chosen by the people were called Comitati, by the consuls Rutili or Rufuli. Sometimes the people created the whole. In dangerous conjunctures, however, the choice was for the most part left entirely to the consuls. Under the emperors they were chosen chiefly from among the senators and equites. The former were called lati-clavii, and the latter angusticlavii, from their peculiar dress. They wore a golden ring, and were in office no longer than six months.] There were also some officers, called tribuni militum consulari potestate, elected instead of consuls, A. U. C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards increased to six, or more, according to the will and pleasure of the people and the emergencies of the state. Part of them were plebeians, and the rest of patrician families. When they had subsisted for about 70 years, not without interruption, the office was totally abolished, as the plebeians were admitted to share the consulship, and the consuls continued at the head of the state till the end of the commonwealth.—The tribuni cohortium pratorianarum were intrusted with the person of the emperor, which they guarded and protected.—The tribuni ærarii were officers chosen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expenses of the army. The richest persons were always chosen, as much money was requisite for the pay of the soldiers. They were greatly distinguished in the state, and they shared with the senators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were abolished by Julius Cæsar, but Augustus re-established them, and created 200 more, to decide causes of smaller importance.—The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus chose for the safety of his person. They were 100 in number, distinguished for their probity, their opulence, and their nobility.—The tribuni voluptatum were commissioned to take care of the amusements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was also honourable.

It was built by the Cenomani, who were dispossessed by the Romans. Some authors affirm that the name Tridentum is derived from Neptune's sceptre or trident, to which god they say the city was once consecrated; this opinion took its rise from an ancient marble being found there on which was Neptune holding a trident. Others derive the name from three rivers that fall into the Adige near the city; while others again ascribe the name to the circumstance of there being three high rocks in the neighbourhood which appear like three teeth, (tres dentes.) Trent is famous in modern history for the council of ecclesiastics which sat there for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the church. It was assembled by Paul 3d in 1545, and continued by 25 sessions till the year 1563 under Julius 3d and Pius 4th.]

TRIPHYLIA, one of the ancient names of Elis. [It took its name, according to Strabo, from the union of three different tribes, (τρεις φυλαι), the Epei, or original inhabitants, the Minyæ who migrated thither, and the Elei.] Liv. 28, c. 8.—A mountain where Jupiter had a temple in the island Panchaia, whence he is called Triphylus.

TRIOPIUM, [a city of Caria, founded by Triopas, son of Erisichthon, and situate near the promontory of Triopium, at the extremity of Doris. On the promontory, which took its name from the city, was a temple of Apollo, known under the name of the Triopæan temple. The Dorians here celebrated games in honour of Apollo; here also was held a general assembly of the Dorians in Asia, upon the model of that of Thermopylæ. vid. Doris.]

TRIPŌLIS, [now Tarobolus, a city of Syria, on the sea-coast below Aradus. The Greek name of this place, Tripolis, denoting three cities, (τρεῖς πόλεις,) is explained by Scylax. He states that the cities of Tyrus, Sidon, and Aradus, sent each a colony to this place, who at first inhabited three separate cities, but in process of time became united into one. Diodorus Siculus, however, gives a somewhat different account. According to him, the three cities above mentioned, which were the parent-states of all the other Phœnician cities, wishing to establish some place of general assembly, sent each a colony hither and founded this city. It had a good harbour and extensive commerce. Now, however, the sand has so accumulated that the city is separated from the sea by a small triangular plain half a league in breadth, at the point of which is the village where the vessels land their goods. The commerce of the place consists almost entirely of coarse silks.]—

Ptolemy and Stephanus ascribe it to Caria, Pliny and Hierocles to Lydia. Mannert considers it to have been a Phrygian city.]

TRIPOLITIS, a surname given to Azorus, the principal city of Pelagonia in Thessaly.]

TRIPŌLĒMUS, [vid. the end of this article,] a son of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to some, of Trochilus, a priest of Argos. According to the more received opinion he was son of Celeus, king of Attica, by Neræa, whom some have called Metanira, Cothonea, Hyona, Melania, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleusis in Attica, and was cured in his youth of a severe illness by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the house of Celeus by the monarch's children, as she travelled over the country in quest of her daughter. To repay the kindness of Celeus, the goddess took particular notice of his son. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to destroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was astonished at the uncommon growth of her son, and she had the curiosity to watch Ceres.

She disturbed the goddess by a sudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning ashes, and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, she taught him agriculture, and rendered him serviceable to mankind by instructing him how to sow corn and make bread. She also gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons, and in this celestial vehicle he travelled all over the earth and distributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia the favourite of Ceres nearly lost his life; but Lynceus, the king of the country, who had conspired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleusis, Triptolemus restored Ceres her chariot, and established the Eleusinian festivals and mysteries in honour of the deity. He reigned for some time, and after death received divine honours. Some suppose that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. [There seems to be an allusion in the name Triptolemus (derived probably from τρεῖς and πῶλος) to an improvement introduced in early agriculture by treble ploughing.] Diod.—Hygin. fab. 147.—Paus. 2, c. 14, l. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 1, c. 5.—Callim. in Cer. 22.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 646.—Fast. 4, v. 501.—Trist. 3, el. 3, v. 1.

TRITON, a sea-deity, son of Neptune by Amphitrite, or, according to some, by Celeno, or Salacia. [vid. Tritonis.] He was very powerful among the sea-deities, and could calm the ocean and abate storms at pleasure. He is generally represented as blowing a shell; his body above the waist is like that of a man, and below a dolphin. Some represent him with the fore feet of a horse. Many of the sea-deities are called Tritons, but the name is generally applied to those only who are half men and half fishes. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 930.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 333.—Cic. de *Nat. TRITŌNIS, a lake and river of Africa, [inland from the Syrtis Minor,] near which Minerva had a temple, whence she is sur-named Tritonis, or Tritonia. [Minerva is said to have been called Tritonia because she first revealed herself in the vicinity of this lake. This, however, is a mere fable. The true etymology of the term Tritonia is from a Cretan word, Τριτω, signifying the head, and hence the epithets, Tritonia in Latin, and Τριτονια in Greek, have reference to her having sprung from the head of Jupiter. Near the Tritonis Palus was the Libya Palus. Modern travellers speak of a long and narrow lake in this quarter, divided in two by a ford; D'Anville considers these to be the Tritonis and Libya Paludes. The modern name of the former is Faroun, and of the latter, el-Loudeah.] Herodot. 4, c. 178.—Paus. 9, c. 33.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 171.—Mela, 1, c. 7. Athens is also called Tritonis, because dedicated to Minerva. Ovid. Met. 5.

TRIVIA, a surname given to Diana, because she presided over all places where three roads met. At the new moon the Athenians offered her sacrifices, and a sumptuous entertainment, which was generally distributed among the poor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13, l. 7, v. 774.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 416.—Fast. 1, v. 389.

TRIVĒ ANTRUM, a place in the valley of Aricia, where the nymph Egeria resided. Mart. 6, ep. 47.

TRIVĒ LUCUS, a place of Campania, in the bay of Cumæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13.

TRIUMVIRI, reipublica constituendæ, were three magistrates appointed equally to govern the Roman state with absolute power. These officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different pursuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The first triumvirate, B. C. 60, was in the hands of J. Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, who, at the expiration of their office, kindled a civil war: The second and last triumvirate, B. C. 43, was under Augustus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally lost their liberty. Augustus disagreed with his colleagues, and after he had defeated them he made himself absolute in Rome. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the space of about 12 years. There were also officers that were called triumviri capitales, created A. U. C. 464. They took cognizance of murders and robberies, and every thing in which slaves were concerned. Criminals under sentence of death were intrusted to their care, and they had them executed according to the commands of the prætors.—The triumviri nocturni watched over the safety of Rome in the night-time, and in case of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the most effectual measures to extinguish it.—The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were sent to settle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair division of the lands among the citizens, and exercised over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the consuls at Rome.—The triumviri monetales were masters of the mint, and had the care of the coin; hence their office was generally intimated with the following letters often seen on ancient coins and medals; TRIVIR. A. A. A. F. F. i. e. Triumviri auro, argento, ære, flando, feriendo. Some suppose that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as those who were employed before them were called Denariorum flandorum curatores.—The triumviri valetudinis were chosen when Rome was visited by a plague or some pestiferous distemper, and they took particular care of the temples of health and virtue.—The triumviri senatus legendi, were appointed to name those that were most worthy to be made senators from among the plebeians. They were first chosen in the age of Augustus, as before, this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the consuls and the censors, A. U. C. 310.—The triumviri mensuræ were chosen in the second Punic war, to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

TRIUMVIRORUM INSULA, [an island in the small river Rhenus, one of the tributaries of the Po,] where the triumvirs Antony, Lepidus, and Augustus, met to divide the Roman empire after the battle of Mutina. Dio. 46, c. 55.—Appian. Cic. 4.

TROÆDES, the inhabitants of Troas.

TROAS, [a district on the Ægean coast of Mysia in Asia Minor, extending as far south as the promontory of Lectum, now cape Baba, of which Troy was the capital.] When Troas is taken for the whole kingdom of Priam, it may be said to contain Mysia and Phrygia Minor; but if only applied to that part of the country where Troy was situate, its extent is confined within very narrow limits. [This is an incorrect remark. The kingdom of Priam, if we form our ideas of it from the poems of Homer, must have been of very limited extent. Strabo, indeed through partiality for his favourite poet, seeks to enlarge the limits of Priam's kingdom, and makes it to have comprehended the country on the coast of the Propontis as far as the river Æsepus, near Cyzicum. Homer, however, names many expressly as allies of the Trojans whom Strabo would wish to consider as the subjects of Priam. The northern part of Troas was termed Dardania, from Dardanus, a city founded by Dardanus, one of the ancestors of Priam. The Trojans were very probably of Thracian origin.] (vid. Troja.)

TROCHOIS, a lake in the island of Delos, near which Apollo and Diana were born.

TROCMI, a people of Galatia, [on the side of Cappadocia.] Liv. 38, c. 16.

TROEZENE, [now Damala,] a town of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, near the Saronic Sinus, which received its name from Troezen, the son of Pelops, who reigned there for some time. It is often called Theseis, because Theseus was born there; and Posidonia, because Neptune was worshipped there. [“This place, observes Mr. Gell, in speaking of Troezen “now represented by a mean village of only 45 habitations, was anciently of considerable extent, the longest side of the city having been at least one mile in length. It was probably, like most of the Grecian cities, of a form approaching to a triangle, having a wall on the plain, from the extremities of which other fortifications ran up the mountain to the Acropolis, on a craggy and detached summit, now very prettily spotted with wild olives." Stat Theb. 4, v. 31.—Paus. 2, c. 50.—Plut. in Thest.—Ovid Met. 8, v. 566, l. 15, v. 296.—Another town at the south of the Peloponnesus.

TROGILÆ, three small islands near Samos.

TROGILUM, a part of Mount Mycale, projecting into the sea. Strab. 14.

TROGLOÏTÆ, a people of Æthiopia, [on the coast of the Sinus Arabicus,] who dwell in caves (τρωγλοῖν specus, δρυμ subeo.) They were all shepherds, and had their wives in common. Strab. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 4 and 8.—Plin. 5, c. 8, l. 37, c. 10.

TROGUS POMPEÏUS, a Latin historian, B. C. 41, born in Gaul. His father was one of the friends and adherents of J. Cæsar, and his ancestors had obtained privileges and honours from the most illustrious of the Romans. Trogus wrote an universal history of all the most important events that had happened from the beginning of the world to the age of Augustus, divided into 44 books. This history, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance, was epitomized by Justin, and is still extant. Some suppose that the epitome is the cause that the original of Trogus is lost. [The title of his history was; "Historiæ Philippicæ et totius mundi originis et terræ situs." He chose this title either in imitation of Theopompus of Chios, who had so named his History of Philip, father of Alexander, and whom Trogus had selected as his model; or else because of these 44 Books into which his work was divided; 35 (namely, from the 7th to the 41st) contained a history of Macedon, and of the kingdoms formed by the successors of Alexander. The history of these was his principal object; he found means, however, to attach to it, as an introduction, or else in the form of episodes, that of other nations: so that he actually wrote a general history comprising a space of 2155 years, from the time of Ninus down to the 748th year of Rome. The work is cited by Priscian as late as the commencement of the sixth century. Pliny frequently quotes from Trogus; and Charisius, a grammarian of the 5th century, informs us that he wrote a work on animals.] Justin. 47, c. 5.—Aug de Civ. D. 4, c. 6.

TROJA, a city, the capital of Troas, or, according to others, a country of which Ilium was the capital. [vid. the end of this article.] It was built on a small eminence, [a short distance above the confluence of the Simois and Scamander, between these two rivers, and about three miles from the shore.] Dardanus, the first king of the country, built it, and called it Dardania, and from Tros, one of his successors, it was called Troja, and from Ilus, Ihon. Neptune is also said to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon. This city has been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil; and of all the wars which have been carried on among the ancients, that of Troy is the most famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks to recover Helen, whom Paris, the son of Priam, king of Troy, had carried away from the house of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cause of Menelaus, and every prince furnished a certain number of ships and soldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ships. Homer mentions them as being 1185, and Thucydides supposed that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which these ships carried is unknown: yet as the largest contained about 120 men each, and the smallest 50, it may be supposed that no less than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was chosen general of all these forces; but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counsellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. [The Grecian camp is supposed to have been between the promontories of Rhæteum and Sigæum.] The most celebrated of the Grecian princes that distinguished themselves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulysses, Diomedes, Protesilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Nestor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was opposed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received assistance from the neighbouring princes in Asia Minor, and reckoned among his most active generals, Rhesus, king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Assyrians and Æthiopians. Many of the adjacent cities were reduced and plundered before the Greeks approached the walls; but when the siege was begun, the enemies on both sides gave proofs of valour and intrepidity. The army of the Greeks, however, was visited by a plague, and the operations were not less retarded by the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles. The loss was great on both sides; the most valiant of the Trojans, and particularly of the sons of Priam, were slain in the field; and indeed so great was the slaughter, that the rivers of the country are represented as filled with dead bodies and suits of armour. After the siege had been carried on for ten years, some of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to ashes. The poets, however, support, that the Greeks made themselves masters of the place by artifice. They secretly filled a large wooden horse with armed men, and led away their army from the plains, as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horse into their city, and in the night, the Greeks that were confined within the sides of the animal rushed out and had opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greatest part of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Christian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 408 years before the first olympiad. [Troy was more than once rebuilt, generally in a situation nearer the sea than the ancient city is supposed to have occupied. It appears to have been reduced to a mere village in the time of Alexander the Great, and was remarkable for nothing but a temple of Minerva, which that prince visited after the battle of Granicus. After the death of Alexander, Antigonus, one of his generals, founded a city in this quarter, which he called Antigonica-Troas; on the fall of Antigonus it came into the possession of Lysimachus, who changed the name to Alexandria-Troas, which it afterwards retained. It is now called Eski Stamboul. It was greatly reduced in power when the Romans entered Asia. As they, however, pretended to be the genuine offspring of the ancient Trojans, no cost or pains were spared to restore it to its former splendour.] It is said that J. Cæsar, who wished to pass for one of the descendants of Æneas, and consequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to transport there the senate and the Roman people. The same apprehensions were entertained in the reign of Augustus, and, according to some, an ode of Horace, Justum & tenacem propositi virum was written purposely to dissuade the emperor from putting into execution so wild a project. (vid. Paris, Æneas, Antenor, Agamemnon, Ilium, Lamædon, Menalaus, &c.) [The controversy respecting the position of ancient Troy is an endless one; and it is no wonder if, amid the opposite and contradictory statements of scholars, some writers, like Bryant, for example, should be led to maintain that no such place as Troy ever existed. The reader who wishes to see what has been most recently written on this interesting subject is referred to the Travels of Clarke, and of Hobhouse, and also to the Treatise of Maclaren, published in London, 1822. This latter writer starts a theory which brings us back nearly to the spot fixed upon by D'Anville before the present controversies began. The splendid work of Mr. Gell, "Topography of Troy," may also be consulted; but it must be observed that he fails entirely in locating the modern village of Bounabarchi on the site of Homer's Troy. Though the great natural features of Troas, such as the promontories, rivers, and mountains, remain, the lapse of more than 3000 years has effaced all those traces of ancient Troy which could alone afford the scholar a safe guide to his favourite object of classical research, the ancient city of Priam. The true cause of the Trojan war appears to have been this: Troy originally belonged to Tantalus, who would seem to have received it from his ancestors. Tantalus was driven out by the family of the Dardanidæ, the last of which line was Priam. Agamemnon and Menalaus therefore, of the race of Tantalus through his son Pelops, sought merely to recover their lost inheritance. The story respecting the suitors, the marriage, and the rape, of Helen, is a mere fable. Helen never was in Troy. Agamemnon compelled the attendance of the other Greeks on the expedition which he undertook, from his being at the head of the Achæan race. vid. remarks under the articles Græcia, Iones, and Helena.] *Virg. TRÖJĀNI and TRÖJUGENÆ, the inhabitants of Troy.

TRÖJĀNI LUDI, games instituted by Æneas, or his son Ascanius, to commemorate the death of Anchises, and celebrated in the circus of Rome. Boys of the best families, dressed in a neat manner, and accoutred with suitable arms and weapons, were permitted to enter the list. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorship, and under Augustus they were observed with unusual pomp and solemnity. A mock-fight on horse-back, or sometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps juvenutis, and was generally the son of a senator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 602.—Sueton. in Cas. & in Aug.—Plut. in Syll.

TRÖLUS, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Achilles during the Trojan war. Apolod. 3, c. 12.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 16.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 474.

TRÖPÆA, a town of the Brutii.—A stone monument on the Pyrenees, erected by Pompey.—Drusi, a town of Germany where Drusus died and Tiberius was saluted emperor by the army.

TROPHONIUS, a celebrated architect, son of Erginus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the assistance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the priestess to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all cheerfulness and pleasure. When the days were passed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pausanias, however, he was swallowed up alive in the earth: and when, afterwards, the country was visited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to seek him at Lebæa, where he gave oracles in a cave. They discovered this cave by means of a swarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to ease their misfortunes. From that time Trophonius was honoured as a god, he passed for the son of Apollo, a chapel and a statue were erected to him, and sacrifices were offered to his divinity when consulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the suppliant was obliged to make particular sacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to descend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards after he had received an answer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it became proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honour of Trophonius at Lebadea. Paus. 9, c. 37, &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.—Plut.—Plin. 34, c. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 45.

TROS, a son of Erichonius, king of Troy, who married Callirhoe, the daughter of the Scamander, by whom he had Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war against Tantalus, king of Phrygia, whom he accused of having stolen away the youngest of his sons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itself Troas. Virg. 3, G. v. 36.—Homer. Il. 20, v. 219.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

TROSSULUM, a town of Etruria, which gave the name of Trossuli to the Roman knights who had taken it without the assistance of foot soldiers. Plin. 32, c. 2.—Senec. ep. 86 and 87.—Pers. 1, v. 82.

TRUENTUM, or TRUENTINUM, a river of Picenum, falling into the Adriatic. There is also a town of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 8, v. 434.—Mela. 2.—Plin. 3, c. 13.

TRYPHIODORUS, a Greek poet and grammarian of Egypt, in the 5th century. [Tryphi-dorus wrote a poem under the title of Marathoniacæ, (Μαραθωνιακῆ); another styled καθ' ἰπποδρωμιαν; a Lipogrammatic Odyssey; and a poem on the destruction of Troy, styled Ἰλίου ἀλωσις. The last is the only one of his productions which has reached us. It is in 681 verses, and appears rather to be the argument of some larger poem, which the poet had perhaps intended at one time to write. The Lipogrammatic Odyssey had this name given to it from a peculiar piece of affectation by which it was marked. The poet, according to some, interdicted himself, in each of its 24 books, the use of a particular letter of the Alphabet. Eustathius, however, states that the letter Σ was banished from the entire poem. The best edition of the poem on the destruction of Troy is perhaps that of Wernicke, Lips. 1819, 8vo.]

TRYPHON, a tyrant of Apamea in Syria, put to death by Antiochus. Justin. 36, c. 1.—A surname of one of the Ptolemies. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 31.—A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of Augustus.

TUBERO, Q. Ælius, a Roman consul, son-in-law of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. He is celebrated for his poverty, in which he seemed to glory as well as the rest of his family. Sixteen of the Tuberos, with their wives and children, lived in a small house, and maintained themselves with the produce of a little field, which they cultivated with their own hands. The first piece of silver plate that entered the house of Tubero was a small cup which his father-in-law presented to him, after he had conquered the king of Macedonia.

TURBUR, two towns of Africa, called Major and Minor. [The first was situate directly to the south of Tunis, and appears to be now Tubernok; the latter was south-west of Carthage, on the Bagradas, and is said to retain the ancient name.]

TUCCA, PLAUTIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. He was, with Varus and Plotius, ordered by Augustus, as some report, to revise the Æneid of Virgil, which remained uncorrected on account of the premature death of the poet. Horat. 1, Sat. 5. v. 40. Sat. 10, v. 84.

TUDER, or TUDERTIA, an ancient town of Umbria. The inhabitants were called Tudertes. Sil. 4, v. 222.

TUISTO, a deity of the Germans, son of Terra, and the founder of the nation. Tacit. de Germ. 2.

TULINGI, a people of Germany between the Rhine and the Danube. Cæs. 1, c. 5, B. G.

TULLIA, a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome. She married Tarquin the Proud after she had murdered her first husband Aruns, and consented to see Tullius assassinated that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown all mangled and bloody in one of the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome with her husband. Ovid. in Ib. 36.—Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the Proud. She was murdered by her own husband, that he might marry her ambitious sister of the same name.—A daughter of Cicero. [vid. Tullioli.]

TULLIA LEX, de senatu, by M. Tullius Cicero, A. U. C. 689, enacted that those who had a libera legatio granted them by the senate, should hold it no more than one year. Such senators as had a libera legatio travelled through the provinces of the empire without any expense, as if they were employed in the affairs of the state.—Another, de ambitu, by the same, the same year. It forbade any person, two years before he canvassed for an office, to exhibit a show of gladiators, unless that case had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus were punished with the aque & ignis interdictio for ten years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more severe than that of the Calpurnian law.

TULLIANUM, a subterranean prison in Rome, built by Servius Tullius, and added to the other called Robur, where criminals were confined. [It is more correct to say that Servius Tullius enlarged the prison built by Ancus Martius; hence the term Tullianum was applied to that part of it below ground which was built by Servius. This dungeon now serves as a subterranean chapel to a small church built on the spot, called San Pietro in Carcere, in commemoration of St. Peter who is supposed to have been confined there.] Sallust. in B. Catil.

TULLIOLA, or TULLIA, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassipes, and lastly P. Corn. Dolabella. With this last husband she had every reason to be dissatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent, and consequently the cause of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in childhood, about 44 years before Christ. Cicero was so inconsolable on this occasion, that some have accused him of an unnatural partiality for his daughter. According to a ridiculous story which some of the moderns report, in the age of pope Paul 3d, a monument was discovered on the Appian road, with the superscription of Tulliola filia mee. The body of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to ashes as soon as touched; there was also a lamp burning, which was extinguished as soon as the air gained admission there, and which was supposed to have been lighted above 1500 years. Cic.—Plut. in Cic.

TULLIUS CIMBER, the son of a freed-man, rose to great honours, and followed the interest of Pompey. He was reconciled to J. Cæsar, whom he murdered with Brutus. Plut.—Cicero, a celebrated orator. (vid. Cicero.)—The son of the orator Cicero. (vid. Cicero.)—A friend of Otho.—One of the kings of Rome. (vid. Servius.)

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, the third king of Rome, after the death of Numa. He was of a warlike and active disposition, and signalized himself by his expedition against the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whose city he destroyed, after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii. He afterwards carried his arms against the Latins and the neighbouring states with success, and enforced reverence for majesty among his subjects. He died with all his family about 640 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 32 years. The manner of his death is not precisely known. Some suppose that he was killed by lightning, while he was performing some magical ceremonies in his own house; or, according to the more probable accounts of others, he was murdered by Ancus Martius, who set fire to the palace, to make it believed that the impiety of Tullus had been punished by heaven. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 814.—Liv. 1, c. 22.—Plut.—A consul, A. U. C. 686. Horat. 3, od. 8, v. 12.

TUNETUM, or TUNES, [a celebrated city of Africa, south-west of, and near to Carthage. Upon the destruction of the city, it became a great and powerful city. It was founded about 1250 or 1300 B. C. as appears from Herodotus and the Parian Chronicle.] In the vicinity of this place Regulus was defeated and taken prisoner by Xanthippus. Liv. 30, c. 9.

TUNCRI, a name given to some of the Germans, supposed to live on the banks of the Maese, whose chief city, called Atuatuca, is now Tongerren.—The river of the country is now the Spaw. Tacit. de Germ. 2.

C. TURANIUS, a Latin tragic poet in the age of Augustus. Ovid. ex. Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 29.

TURBO, a gladiator, mentioned Horat. 2,

Sat. 3, v. 310. He was of a small stature, but uncommonly courageous.

TURDETANI, [a people of Bætica in Spain, in the south-eastern part. They extended along the coast, from the Anas to the Bastuli Poeni, and their territory was famed for its beauty and fertility, and by some of the ancient writers was considered the most favoured spot on the whole earth. Here, too, Strabo locates the Elysian fields of Homer. This district, besides being very productive, was enabled to carry on an extensive and lucrative commerce with the nations of the interior, by means of the Bætis, which traversed it.] Liv. 21, c. 6, l. 28, c. 39, l. 34, c. 17.

[TURDŪLI, a people of Bætica in Spain, situate to the north, and north-east of the Turdetani.]

TURIA, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean, now Guadalquivar. [It passes by Valencia.]

TURICUM, a town of Gaul, now Zurich in Switzerland.

TURNUS, a king of the Rutuli, son of Daunus and Venilia. He made war against Æneas, and attempted to drive him away from Italy, that he might not marry the daughter of Latinus, who had been previously engaged to him. His efforts were attended with no success, though supported with great courage and a numerous army. He was conquered, and at last killed in a single combat by Æneas. He is represented as a man of uncommon strength. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 56, &c.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 49.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 379. Met. 14, v. 451.

TURŌNES, a people of Gaul, [on the banks of the Ligeris, about 140 miles from the sea,] whose capital, Cæsarodunum, is the modern Tours.

[TURRIS HANNIBALIS, a small place on the coast of Africa, below Thapsus. From this Annibal took his departure for Asia when he was banished by his factious and ungrateful countrymen from Carthage. It is now Mahdia.]—[Stratonis, the previous name of Cæsarea, on the coast of Palestine. vid. Cæsarea.]

TURUNTUS, a river of Sarmatia, supposed to be the Divina or Duna.

TUSCANIA and TUSCIA, a large country at the west of Rome, the same as Etruria. (vid. Etruria.)

TUSCI, the inhabitants of Etruria.—The villa of Pliny the younger, near the sources of the Tiber. Plin. ep. 5 and 6.

TUSCULANUM, a country-house of Cicero, near Tusculum, where, among other books, the orator composed his questiones concerning the contempt of death, &c. in five books. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 4. Att. 15, ep. 2. Div. 2, c. 1.

TUSCŪLUM, a town of Latium on the declivity of a hill, about 12 miles from Rome, founded by Telegonus the son of Ulysses and Circe. [Its name rather proves it to have been of Etrurian origin.] It is now called Frascati, and is famous for the magnificent

TUSCUS VICUS, a small village near Rome. It received this name from the Etrurians of Porsenna's army that settled there. Liv. 2, c. 14.

TUSCUM MARE, a part of the Mediterranean on the coast of Etruria. [vid. Tyrrhenum.]

TUTA, a queen of Illyricum, &c. [vid. Teuta.]

TUTIA, a vestal virgin accused of incontinence. She proved herself to be innocent by carrying water from the Tiber to the temple of Vesta in a sieve, after a solemn invocation to the goddess. Liv. 20.—A small river six miles from Rome, where Annibal pitched his camp when he retreated from the city. Iv. 26, c. 11.

TUTICUM, a town of the Hirpini.

TYANA, a town at the foot of Mount Taurus in Cappadocia, where Apollonius was born; whence he is called Tyaneus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 719.—Strab. 12.

TYANITIS, [a district in the southern part of Cappadocia, near Cilicia, the capital of which was Tyana.]

TYBRIS. [vid. Tiberis.]

TYCHE, a part of the town of Syracuse. [It contained a temple of Fortune (Τυχη), whence the name.] Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53.

TYCHIUS, a celebrated artist of Hyle in Bœotia, who made Hector's shield, which was covered with the hides of seven oxen. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 823.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 7, v. 220.

TYDEUS, a son of Æneus, king of Calydon and Peribœa. He fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends, and found a safe asylum in the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, whose daughter Deiphyle he married. When Adrastus wished to replace his son-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to go and declare war against Eteocles, who usurped the crown. The reception he met provoked his resentment; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to single combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos, he slew 50 of the Thebans who had conspired against his life, and laid in ambush to surprise him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. He was one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at last wounded by Melanippus. Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the strength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground before he was carried away from the fight by his companions. At his own request, the dead body of Melanippus was brought to him, and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth. The savage barbarity of Tydeus displeased Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief, and to make him immortal, and the goddess left him to his fate and suffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was still to be seen in the age of Pausanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some suppose that the cause of his flight to Argos was the murder of the son of Melus, or, according to others, of Alcathous, his father's brother, or perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer. Il. 4, v. 365, 387.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 6.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.—Diod. 2.—Eudip. in Sup.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 479.—Ovid. in Ib. 350, &c.

TYDIDES, a patronymic of Diomedes, as son of Tydeus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 101.—Horat. 1, Od. 15, v. 28.

TYLOS, [an island in the Sinus Persicus, on the Arabian coast, the pearl fishery on whose coasts has rendered it famous in antiquity; and the same circumstance still contributes to its renown under the name of Bahram, which in Arabic signifies two seas.]

TYMÖLUS, a mountain. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 15. [vid. Tmolus.]

TYMPHÆI, a people between Epirus and Thessaly.

TYNDÁRIDÆ, a patronymic of the children of Tyndarus, as Castor, Pollux, and Helen, &c. Ovid. Met. 8.

TYNDÁRIS, a patronymic of Helen, daughter of Tyndarus. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 569.—A town of Sicily near Pelorus, founded by a Messenian colony. Strab. 6.—Plin. 2, c. 91.—Sil. 14, v. 209.—Horace gave this name to one of his mistresses as best expressive of all female accomplishments. 1, Od. 17, v. 10.—A name given to Cassandra. Ovid. A. A. 2, v. 408.—A town of Colchis on the Pasis. Plin.

TYNDÁRUS, son of Œbalus and Gorgophone, or, according to some, of Perieres. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married the celebrated Leda, who bore him Timandra, Philonoe, &c. and also became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. [vid. Leda, Castor, Pollux, Clytemnestra, &c.]

TYPHÆUS, or TYPHON, a famous giant, son of Tartarus and Terra, who had a hundred heads like those of a serpent or a dragon. Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the dissonant shrieks of different animals. He was no sooner born, than, to avenge the death of his brothers, the giants, he made war against heaven, and so frightened the gods that they fled away and assumed different shapes. Jupiter became a ram, Mercury an ibis, Apollo a crow, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, Venus a fish, &c. The father of the gods at last resumed courage, and put Typhæus to flight with his thunderbolts, and crushed him under Mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, or, according to some, under the island Inarime. Typhæus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orthos, by his union with Echidna.

Hygin. fab. 152 and 196.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 325.—Æschyl. sept. ante Theb.—Hesiod. Theog. 820.—Homer. Hym.—Herodot. 2, c. 156.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

TYPHON, a giant whom Juno produced by striking the earth. Some of the poets make him the same as the famous Typhæus. [vid. Typhæus.]—A brother of Osiris, who married Nephtys. He laid snares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him at his return. The death of Osiris was avenged by his son Orus, and Typhon was put to death. [vid. Osiris.] He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cause of every evil, and on that account generally represented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut. in Is. & Os.—Diod. 1.

TYRANNION, a grammarian of Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophrastus, and he received that of Tyrannion, from his austerity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and restored to his liberty by Muræna. He opened a school in the house of Cicero, and enjoyed his friendship. He was extremely fond of books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and industry the world is indebted for the preservation of Aristotle's works. [vid. however, Aristoteles.]—There was also one of his disciples, called Diocles, who bore his name. He was a native of Phœnicia, and was made prisoner in the war of Augustus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favourites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote 68 different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

TYRAS, or TYRA, a river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Euxine Sea between the Danube and the Borysthenes, now called the Niester. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 50.

TYRO, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmonæus, king of Elis, and Alcideice. She was treated with great severity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at last removed from her father's house by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her favourite lover and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom she exposed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preserved by shepherds, and when they had arrived to years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by assassinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom she had Amythaon, Pheres, and Eson. Tyro is often called Salmonis, from her father. Homer. Od. 11, v. 234.—Pyndar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Diod. 4.—Propert. 1, el. 13, v. 20, l. 2, el. 30, v. 51, l. 3, el. 19, v. 13.—Ovid. Am. 3, el. 6, v. 43.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 42.

TYROS, a city of Phœnicia. [vid. Tyrus.]

TYRRHEIDÆ, a patronymic given to the sons of Tyrrheus, who kept the flocks of Latinius. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 484.

TYRRHËNI, the inhabitants of Etruria. [vid. Etruria.]

TYRRHËNUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Etruria. It is also called Inferum, as being at the bottom or south of Italy.

TYRRHËNUS, a son of Atys, king of Lydia, who came to Italy, where part of the country was called after him. Strab. 5.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 55.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.

TYRRHËUS, a shepherd of king Latinus, whose stag, being killed by the companions of Ascanius, was the first cause of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Hence the word Tyrrheides. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 485.

TYRSIS, a place in the Balearides, supposed to be the palace of Saturn.

TYRTÆUS, a Greek elegiac poet, born in Attica, son of Archimbrotus. [vid. the end of this article.] In the second Messenian war, the Lacedæmonians were directed by the oracle to apply to the Athenians for a general, if they wished to finish their expedition with success, and they were contemptuously presented with Tyrtæus. The poet, though ridiculed for his many deformities, and his ignorance of military affairs, animated the Lacedæmonians with martial songs, just as they wished to raise the siege of Ithome, and inspired them with so much courage that they defeated the Messenians. For his services, he was made a citizen of Lacedæmon, and treated with great attention. Of the compositions of Tyrtæus, nothing is extant but the fragments of four or five elegies. He flourished about 684 B. C. [The native country of Tyrtæus is a point not well ascertained. The common opinion is in favour of his having been an Athenian; but Suidas says that he was a Lacedæmonian or Milesian. Some have endeavoured to reconcile these opposite statements, by supposing that he was a Milesian by birth, but had obtained a domicil at Athens. Belonging to a Dorian family, and regarding the Spartans as his kindred race, he joined them when involved in a dangerous war. The account given of him above wears the garb of mere fable. The deformity of his person had no foundation whatever in truth. His lameness is only a satirical allusion to his frequent use of the pentameter verse. The best editions of the remains of Tyrtæus are, that of Klotzius, Altenb. 1767, and that of Brunck, in his Analecta.] Justin. 2, c. 5.—Strab. 8.—Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 7.—Horat. de Art. p. 402.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Paus. 4, c. 6, &c.

TYRUS, or TYROS, a very ancient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians, on a small island at the south of Sidon, about 200 stadia from the shore, and now called Sar. [Tyre is called in the Old Testament Zor; by the inhabitants it was termed Sor. The Roman traders altered this to Sar, and Sarra, whence the epithet Sarranus in Virgil.] Tyre, though originally a colony of Sidon, in process of time far surpassed the parent state. There were, properly speaking, two places of that name, the old Tyros, called Palatytros, on the sea-shore, and the other in the island. It was about 19 miles in circumference, including Palatytros, but without it about four miles. Tyre was destroyed by the princes of Assyria, and afterwards rebuilt. [The new city was not built on the site of the old one, but on a small island contiguous to the shore. It is more than probable that it existed previous to the destruction of the ancient city, and formed a part of it, but was enlarged after the ruin of the old.] It maintained its independence, [or rather yielded only a nominal subjection to the Persian power,] till the age of Alexander, who took it with much difficulty, and only after he had joined the island to the continent by a mole, after a siege of seven months, on the 20th of August, B. C. 332. The Tyrians were naturally industrious, their city was the emporium of commerce; and they were deemed the inventors of scarlet and purple colours. They founded many cities in different parts of the world, such as,

Carthage Gades, Leptis, Utica, &c. which on that account are often distinguished by the epithet Tyria. [The extensive commerce of Tyre is well known. The Phœnician merchants visited all the shores of the Mediterranean, and even extended their adventurous course to the modern Scilly Isles and the Baltic. Their inland trade also put them in possession of the rich commodities of Egypt, Arabia, India, and the whole of Asia.] The buildings of Tyre were very splendid and magnificent; the walls were 150 feet high, with a proportionable breadth. Hercules was the chief deity of the place. It had two large and capacious harbours, and a powerful fleet; and was built, according to some writers, about 2760 years before the Christian era. Strab. 10.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela. 1, c. 12.—Curt. 4, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 6, 339. &c.—Ovid. Fast. 1, &c.—Met. 5 and 10.—Lucan. 3, &c.—A nymph, mother of Venus, according to some.

[TYSDRUS, a city of Africa Propria, not far from the coast, below Turris Hannibalis. It is supposed to coincide as to position with the modern el-Jem.]

VA

VACATIONE, (lex de) was enacted concerning the exemption from military service, and contained this very remarkable clause, nisi bellum Gallicum exoriatur, in which case the priests themselves were not exempted from service. This can intimate how apprehensive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

VACCA, a town of Numidia, [on the river Rubicatus, south-west of Carthage. It is now Veja. Vacca was a place of great note in the Jugurthine war.] Sallust. Jug.

VACCÆI, a people at the north of Spain, [occupying, according to Manuert, what is now the greater part of Valladolid, Leon, Palencia, and the province of Toro.] Liv. 21, c. 5, l. 35, c. 7, l. 46, c. 47.

VACŪNA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over repose and leisure, as the word indicates (vocare.) Her festivals were observed in the month of December. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 307.—Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 49.

VADIMŌNIS LACUS, now Bossano, a lake of Etruria, whose waters were sulphureous. The Etrurians were defeated there by the Romans, and the Goths by Dolabella. Liv. 9, c. 39.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—Plin. 8, ep. 20.

VAGEDRŪSA, a river of Sicily, between the towns of Camarina and Gela. Sil. 14, v. 229.

VAGĒNI, or VAGIENNI, a people of Liguria, at the sources of the Po, whose capital was called Augusta Vagiennorum. Sil. 2, v. 606.

VAHĀLIS, a river of modern Holland, now called the Waal. [vid. Rhenus.] Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6.

VALA, C. Numonius, a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addressed 1 ep. 15.

VALENS, Flavius, a son of Gratian, born in Pannonia. His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eastern part of the Roman empire. The bold measures and the threats of the rebel Procopius, frightened the new emperor; and if his friends had not intervened, he would have willingly resigned all his pretensions to the empire, which his brother had intrusted to his care. By perseverance, however, Valens was enabled to destroy his rival, and to distinguish himself in his wars against the northern Barbarians. But his lenity to these savage intruders proved fatal to the Roman power; and by permitting some of the Goths to settle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free access to every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his subjects, and to disturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the Barbarians obtained some advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obscurity of the night, and the affection of his soldiers for his person, into a lonely house, which the Goths set on fire. Valens, unable to make his escape, was burnt alive in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of 15 years, A. D. 378. He has been blamed for his superstition and cruelty in putting to death all such of his subjects whose name began by Theod, because he had been informed by his favourite astrologers that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whose name began with these letters. Valens did not possess any of the great qualities which distinguish a great and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a disposition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet though timorous in the highest degree, he was warlike; and though fond of ease, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but such as possessed merit. He was a great friend of discipline, a pattern of chastity and temperance, and he showed himself always ready to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian. &c.—Valerius, a proconsul of Achaia, who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, when Marcian, who had been invested with the purple in the east, attempted to assassinate him. He reigned only six months, and was murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 261.—Fabius, a friend of Vitellius, whom he saluted emperor in opposition to Otho. He was greatly honoured by Vitellius, &c.—The name of the second Mercury mentioned by Cic. d. Nat. D. 3, c. 22, but considered as more properly belonging to Jupiter.

VALENTIA, one of the ancient names of Rome.—A town of Spain, [now Valencia, on the Turia or Guadalaviar,] a little below Saguntum, founded by J. Brutus, and for some time known by the name of Julia Colonia.—[A town of the Segalauni, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the banks of the Rhodanus. It is now Valence.—Another in Sardinia.

VALENTINIÄNUS 1st, a son of Gratian, raised to the imperial throne by his merit and valour. He kept the western part of the empire for himself, and appointed over the east his brother Valens. He gave the most convincing proofs of his military valour in the victories which he obtained over the Barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deserts of Africa, or on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The insolence of the Quadi he punished with great severity; and when these desperate and indigent Barbarians had deprecated the conqueror's mercy, Valentinian treated them with contempt, and upbraided them with every mark of resentment. While he spoke with such warmth, he broke a blood-vessel, and fell lifeless on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and soon after died, after suffering the greatest agonies, violent fits, and contortions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A. D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He has been represented by some as cruel and covetous in the highest degree. He was naturally of an irascible disposition, and he gratified his pride in expressing a contempt for those who were his equals in military abilities, or who shone for gracefulness or elegance of address. Ammian.—About six days after the death of Valentinian, his second son, Valentinian the second, was proclaimed emperor, though only five years old. He succeeded his brother Gratian, A. D. 383, but his youth seemed to favour dissension, and the attempts and the usurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian;

and in this helpless situation he had recourse to Theodosius, who was then emperor of the east. He was successful in his applications; Maximus was conquered by Theodosius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was some time after strangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogastes, in whom he had placed too much confidence, and from whom he expected more deference than the ambition of a Barbarian could pay. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A. D. 392, at Vienne, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applause which the populace bestowed upon him was bestowed upon real merit. He abolished the greatest part of the taxes; and because his subjects complained that he was too fond of the amusements of the circus, he ordered all such festivals to be abolished, and all the wild beasts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be slain. He was remarkable for his benevolence and clemency, not only to his friends, but even to such as had conspired against his life; and he used to say, that tyrants alone are suspicious. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodosius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and security.—Valentinian the third, was son of Constantian and Placidia, the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was saluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as such at Rome, the 3d of October, A. D. 423, about the 6th year of his age. He was at first governed by his mother, and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers; and when he came to years of discretion, he disgraced himself by violence, oppression, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midst of Rome, A. D. 454, in the 36th year of his age, and 31st of his reign, by Pretonius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian the third were conspicuous; every passion he wished to gratify at the expense of his honour, his health, and character; and as he lived without one single act of benevolence or kindness, he died lamented by none, though pitied for his imprudence and vicious propensities. He was the last of the family of Theodosius.—A son of the emperor Gratian, who died when very young.

VALERIA, a sister of Publicola, who advised the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the resentment of Coriolanus. Plut. in Cor.—A daughter of Publicola, given as an hostage to Porsenna by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country with Clælia, and swam across the Tiber. Plut. de Virt. Vul.—A daughter of Messala, sister to Hortensius, who married Sylla.—The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c.—A road in Sicily, which led from Messana to Lilybæum.—A town of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 3.

VALERIA LEX, de provocatione, by P. Va-

lerius Poplicola, the sole consul, A. U. C. 243. It permitted the appeal from a magistrate to the people, and forbade the magistrate to punish a citizen for making the appeal. It further made it a capital crime for a citizen to aspire to the sovereignty of Rome, or to exercise any office without the choice and approbation of the people. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—Liv. 2, c. 8.—Dion. Hal. 4.—Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors should discharge their debtors on receiving a fourth part of the whole sum.—Another, by M. Valerius Corvinus, A. U. C. 453, which confirmed the first Valerian law enacted by Poplicola.—Another, called also Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius, the consuls, A. U. C. 304. It revived the first Valerian law, which under the triumvirate had lost its force.—Another, de magistratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola, sole consul, A. U. C. 243. It created two quæstors to take care of the public treasure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn. Plut. in Pop.—Liv. 2.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A. D. 254. The virtues which shone in him when a private man, were lost when he ascended the throne. Formerly distinguished for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the uninfluenced choice of all Rome upon him, Valerian, invested with the purple, displayed inability and meanness. He was cowardly in his operations, and though unacquainted with war, and the patron of science, he seldom acted with prudence, or favoured men of true genius and merit. He took his son Gallienus as his colleague in the empire, and showed the malevolence of his heart by persecuting the Christians whom he had for a while tolerated. He also made war against the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook against Sapor, king of Persia, his arms were attended with ill success. He was conquered in Mesopotamia, and when he wished to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror seized his person, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he exposed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and insolence of his subjects. When the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, Valerian served as a footstool, and the many other insults which he suffered, excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at last ordered him to be flayed alive, and salt to be thrown over his mangled body, so that he died in the greatest torments. His skin was tanned, and painted in red; and that the ignominy of the Roman empire might be lasting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Persia. Valerian died in the 71st year of his age, A. D. 260, after a reign of seven years.—A grandson of Valerian the emperor. He was put to death when his father, the emperor Gallienus, was killed.—One of the generals of the usurper Niger.—A worthy senator, put to death by Hellogabalus.

VALERIUS PUBLIUS, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Poplicola for his popularity. He was very active in assisting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the first that took an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. Though he had been refused the consulship, and had retired with great dissatisfaction from the direction of affairs, yet he regarded the public opinion, and when the jealousy of the Romans inveighed against the towering appearance of his house, he acknowledged the reproof, and in making it lower, he showed his wish to be on a level with his fellow-citizens, and not to erect what might be considered as a citadel for the oppression of his country. He was afterwards honoured with the consulship, on the expulsion of Collatinus, and he triumphed over the Etrurians after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the sons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times consul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and the gratitude which people redeemed from slavery and oppression usually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was so poor that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 3, c. 8, &c.—Corvinus, a tribune of the soldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones, remarkable for his strength and stature, Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an easy victory, by means of a crow that assisted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul, whence his surname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring states that made war against Rome, and was six times honoured with the consulship. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many private and public virtues. Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 7, c. 27, &c.—Plut. in Mar.—Cic. in Cat.—Antias, an excellent Roman historian often quoted, and particularly by Livy.—Flaccus, a consul with Cato, whose friendship he honourably shared. He made war against the Insubres and Boii, and killed 10,000 of the enemy.—Marcus Corvinus Messala, a Roman made consul with Augustus. He distinguished himself by his learning as well as military virtues. He lost his memory about two years before his death, and, according to some, he was even ignorant of his own name. Sueton. in Aug.—Cic. in Brut.—Soranus, a Latin poet in the age of Julius Cæsar, put to death for betraying a secret. He acknowledged no god but the soul of the universe.—A Latin historian who carried arms under the sons of Pompey. [He is usually styled Valerius Maximus. The anonymous but ancient author of his life makes him to have been descended from the Valerian family on the father's side, and from the Fabian on the mother's side. His surname Maximus indicates the latter part of this genealogy.] He dedicated his time to study, and wrote an account of all the most celebrated sayings and actions of the Romans, and other illustrious persons, which is still extant, and divided into nine books. It is dedicated to Tiberius. [He classifies the individuals, of whom he treats, according to some peculiar virtue or vice, of which they were cited as examples. He first confines himself to Romans, and then to other nations, especially the Greeks. The titles of his chapters are the work of the grammarians or copyists, as appears very clearly from the use of words which were unknown during the silver age of Roman literature. Valerius displays neither judgment in his choice of anecdotes, nor skill in their arrangement, nor good taste in his use of expressions and in the transitions which he frequently makes from the natural order of things. No one ever carried flattery to a greater extent: his preface, addressed to Tiberius, is perfectly disgusting. His manner of narrating is far from pleasing; and his style is cold, declamatory, and affected. Notwithstanding its faults, however, the work is interesting both for the history and the study of antiquity, and contains a number of little facts taken from authors whose works have not reached us. Some critics believe, though on no very sure grounds, that the work in question is a compilation from a larger one by the same author, and was executed by C. Titus Probus, or Julius Paris. Others in like manner ascribe it to Januarius Nepotianus. These three individuals are equally unknown. The best edition of Valerius Maximus is that of Kappius, Lips. 1782, 8vo.] Some have even supposed that he lived after the age of Tiberius, from the want of purity and elegance which so conspicuously appear in his writings, unworthy of the correctness of the golden age of the Roman literature. The best editions of Valerius are those of Torrenius, 4to. L. Bat. 1726, and of Vorstius, 8vo. Beroлин. 1672.—Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, to show their sense of his great merit, built him a house on Mount Palatine at the public expense.—Potitus, a general who stirred up the people and army against the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was chosen consul, and conquered the Volsci and Æqui.—Flaccus a Roman, intimate with Cato the censor. He was consul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 Gauls in one battle. He was also chosen censor, and prince of the senate, &c.—A Latin poet who flourished under Vespasian. He wrote a poem in eight books on the Argonautic expedition, but it remained unfinished on account of his premature death. [The manuscripts of this poem add to the name of Valerius Flaccus that of Setinus Balbus. It has been supposed by some critics that this last was the name of a grammarian who made a revision of the text, or who, perhaps, was the possessor of a remarkable manuscript. The birth-place of the writer is also involved in some doubt. It is believed by many that his native place was Patavium, and this opinion is founded on various passages of Martial. Others suppose that he was born at Setia in Campania, and allege the name Setinus in favour of this position. This latter name, however, has been explained above. There has come down to us, among the epigrams of Martial, one addressed to Valerius Flaccus, in which the former advises him to renounce poetry and apply himself to the studies of the bar, as affording a better means for accumulating a fortune. From this some have been led to believe that his poetical talents were not held in very high esteem by his contemporaries. Quintilian, however, speaks of his death as a great loss to literature. He died A. D. 88, in the reign of Domitian. The "Argonautics" of Valerius Flaccus is in 8 books, the last imperfect. Had the poem been completed it is thought that it would have occupied ten or twelve books. It is an imitation of the work of Apollonius of Rhodes on the same subject. The critics are far from being agreed as to its merits: some rank it next to the Æneid; while others, who regard beauty of diction as less essential than invention, assign it a much lower rank, and give the preference to the poems of Statius, Lucan, and even Silius Italicus. In truth, the "Argonautics" is clearly deficient in originality. The principal fault of the poem is that the enterprize of the Argonauts, which forms the chief interest of the fable, is continually lost sight of amid numerous digressions and episodes. Hence the poem wears in general a cold and monotonous appearance. It is not, however, without beauties; it contains descriptions highly poetical, and some very ingenious comparisons. It is remarkable that in the passages where Valerius does not imitate Apollonius he is far more elegant than in those where he copies him. His style is concise and energetic, but oftentimes obscure and affected. Frequently, too, he sacrifices nature to art, and to an anxiety for displaying the stores of his erudition.] The best editions of Flaccus are those of Burman, L. Bat. 1724, and 12mo. Utr. 1702.—Asiaticus, a celebrated Roman accused of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned by the intrigues of Messalina, though innocent, and he opened his veins and bled to death. Tacit. Ann.—Lævinus, a consul who fought against Pyrrhus during the Tarentine war. vid. Lævinus.

VALGIUS RUFUS, a Roman poet in the Augustan age, celebrated for his writings. He was very intimate with Horace. Tibull. 3, l. 1, v. 180.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 82.

VANDALI, a people of Germany. [The Vandals seem to have been of Gothic origin. Pliny and Procopius agree in making them such, and the latter writer more especially affirms, in express terms, that the Goths and Vandals, though distinguished by name, were the same people, agreeing in their manners and speaking the same language. They were called Vandals from the Teutonic term "Wenden," which signifies to wander. They began to be troublesome to the Romans A. D. 160, in the reign of Aurelius and Verus: in the year 410 they made themselves masters of Spain, in conjunction with the Alans and Suevi, and received for their share what from them was termed Vandalusia, now Andalusia. In 429 they crossed into Africa under Genseric, who not only made himself master there of Byzacium, Gætulia, and part of Numidia, but also crossed over into Italy A. D. 455, and plundered Rome. After the death of Genseric the Vandal power declined.] Tacit. de Germ. c. 3.

VANGIONES, a people of Germany. Their capital, Borbetomagus, is now called Worms. Lucan. 1, v. 431.—Cæs. G. 1, c. 51.

VANNIA, a town of Italy, north of the Po, now called Civita.

VARANES, a name common to some of the Persian monarchs in the age of the Roman emperors.

[VARDANUS or VARDANIUS, a river of Asia, called otherwise Hypanis, which rises in the central part of Caucasus and falls into the Palus Mæotis by several mouths. It receives in its course all the water of the western branch of the Caucasian chain. The sandy plain which extends to the north of this river furnishes it with more. Its two principal mouths embrace the island of Taman, in which the town of Fanegoria, the ancient Phanagoria, attracts a little trade. The modern name Kuban of the river Hypanis preserves traces of the ancient appellation, since, according to the pronunciation of the dialects of the north of Asia, the h, uttered from the throat, becomes k.]

VARIA LEX, de majestate, by the tribune L. Varius, A. U. C. 662. It ordained that all such as had assisted the confederates in their war against Rome should be publicly tried.—Another, de civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida. It punished all such as were suspected of having assisted or supported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizens of Rome. Cic. pro Mil. 36. in Brut. 56, 88, &c.

LUCIUS VARIUS, or VARUS, a tragic poet intimate with Horace and Virgil. He was one of those whom Augustus appointed to revise Virgil's Æneid. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. Besides tragedies, he wrote a panegyric on the emperor. Quintilian says, l. 10, that his Thyestes was equal to any composition of the Greek poets. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40.

VARRO, M. Terentius, a Roman consul defeated at Cannæ, by Annibal. (vid. Terentius.)—A Latin writer celebrated for his great learning. He wrote no less than 500 different volumes which are all now lost, except a treatise de Re Rusticâ, and another de Linguâ Latinâ, in five books, written in his 90th year, and dedicated to the orator Cicero. He was Pompey's lieutenant in his piratical wars, and obtained a naval crown. He was born in the 637th year of Rome, and was descended of an ancient senatorial family. It is probable that his youth, and even the greater part of his manhood, was spent in literary pursuits, and in the acquisition of that stupendous knowledge which has procured him the appellation of "the most learned of the Romans." In 686 he served under Pompey in his war against the pirates, in which he commanded the Greek ships. To the fortunes of that commander he continued firmly attached, and was appointed one of his lieutenants in Spain, along with Afranius and Petreius, at the commencement of the war with Cæsar. Hispania Ulterior was specially confided to his protection, and two legions were placed under his command. After the surrender of his colleagues in Hither Spain, Cæsar proceeded in person against him. Varro appears to have been little qualified to cope with such an adversary. One of the legions deserted before his own eyes, and his retreat to Cadiz, where he had meant to retire, having been cut off, he surrendered at discretion, with the other, in the vicinity of Corduba. From that period he despaired of the salvation of the republic, and receiving his freedom from Cæsar, he proceeded to Dyrrachium, to give Pompey a detail of what had passed. This latter place he left almost immediately thereafter for Rome. After his return to Italy, he withdrew from all political concerns, and indulged himself during the remainder of his life in the enjoyment of literary leisure. The only service which he performed for Cæsar was that of arranging the books which the dictator had himself procured, or which had been acquired by those who had preceded him in the management of public affairs. He lived during the reign of Cæsar in habits of the closest intimacy with Cicero. The greater part of his time was passed at the various villas which he possessed in Italy. After the assassination of Cæsar, Varro's principal villa, situate near the town of Casinum, in the territory of the Volsci, was forcibly seized by Marc Antony, along with almost all his wealth. Nor was this all. His name was also placed in the list of the proscribed, although he was at the advanced age of 70 years. His friends, however, secreted him, and he remained in a place of safety until a special edict was passed by the consul, M. Plancus, under the triumviral seal, excepting him and Messala Corvinus from the general slaughter. But though Varro thus escaped, he was unable to save his library, which was placed in the garden of one of his villas, and fell into the hands of an illiterate soldiery. After the battle of Actium, Varro resided at Rome until his decease, which happened A. U. C. 727, when he was ninety years of age. His wealth was restored by Augustus, but his books could not be supplied. It is not improbable that the loss of his books, which impeded the prosecution of his studies, and prevented the composition of such works as may have required reference and consultation, may have induced Varro to employ the remaining part of his life in delivering those precepts of agriculture, which had been the result of long experience, and which needed only reminiscence to inculcate. It was some time after the loss of his books, and when he had nearly reached the age of eighty, that Varro composed the work on husbandry, as he himself testifies in the introduction. "Varro," observes Martyn, "writes more like a scholar than a man practically acquainted with agricultural pursuits." This work, together with that "De Lingua Latinâ," are the only two of Varro's productions that have reached us; and the latter is incomplete. It is on account of this philological production that Aulus Gellius ranks him among the grammarians who form a numerous and important class in the History of Latin Literature. This work originally consisted of twenty-four books, and was divided into three great parts. The first six books were devoted to etymological researches. The second division, which extended from the commencement of the seventh to the end of the twelfth book, comprehended the accidents of verbs, and the different changes which they undergo from declension, conjugation, and comparison. The author admits but of two kinds of words, nouns and verbs, to which he refers all the other parts of speech. He distinguishes also two sorts of declension, of which he calls the one arbitrary, and the other natural or necessary. With the ninth book terminates the fragment we possess of Varro's treatise. The third part of the work, which contained twelve books, treated of syntax. It also contained a sort of glossary, which explained the true meaning of Latin terms. This may be considered as one of the chief works of Varro, and was certainly a laborious and ingenious production; but the author is evidently too fond of deriving words from the ancient dialects of Italy, instead of recurring to the Greek, which, after the capture of Tarentum, became a great source of Latin terms. There was also a distinct treatise, "De Sermone Latino," addressed to Marcellus, of which a very few fragments are preserved by Aulus Gellius. The critical works of Varro were also numerous, but almost nothing is known of their contents. His mythological or theological productions were much studied, and very frequently cited by the early fathers, particularly by St. Augustine and Lactantius. This part of his works chiefly contributed to the splendid reputation of Varro, and was extant as late as the beginning of the 14th century. Petrarch had seen it in his youth. It subsequently, however, disappeared. In history Varro was also conspicuous, and Plutarch, in his Life of Romulus, speaks of him as a man of all the Romans most versed in this department of knowledge. The philosophical writings of Varro are not numerous. His chief work of this description, entitled "De Philosophia Liber," appears to have been very comprehensive. St. Augustine informs us that Varro examined in it all the various sects of philosophers, of which he enumerates upwards of 280. The sect of the Old Academy was that which he himself followed, and its tenets he maintained in opposition to all others. Varro derived much notoriety from his satirical compositions. His Tricarenus or Tricipitina, was a satiric history of the triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus. Much pleasantry and sarcasm were also interspersed in his books entitled Logistorici; but his most celebrated production in that line was the satire which he himself entitled Menippean. It was so called from the Cynic Menippus of Gadara, who was in the habit of expressing himself jocularly upon the most grave and important subjects. The appellation of Menippean was given to his satires by Varro, because he imitated the philosopher's general style of humour. In its external form it appears to have been a sort of literary anomaly. Greek words and phrases were interspersed with Latin; prose was mingled with verses of various measures; and pleasantry with serious remark. Many fragments of this Menippean satire remain, but they are much broken and corrupted. The heads of the different subjects, or chapters, contained in it, amounting to nearly one hundred and fifty, have been given by Fabricius in alphabetical order. Some of them are in Latin, others in Greek. Many minor productions of Varro might be also mentioned did our limits permit. A sufficient number, however, have been cited to justify the panegyric of Cicero—"His works brought us home, as it were, while we were foreigners in our own city, and wandering like strangers, so that we might know who and where we were; for in them are laid open the chronology of his country, a description of the seasons, the laws of religion, the ordinances of the priests, domestic and military occurrences, the situations of countries and places, the names of all things divine and human, the breed of animals, moral duties, and the origin of things." (Dæmlop's Roman Literature, vol. 2, p. 34, seq.) He has been greatly commended by Cicero for his erudition, and St. Augustin says, that it cannot but be wondered how Varro, who read such a number of books, could find time to compose so many volumes; and how he who composed so many volumes could be at leisure to peruse such a variety of books, and gain so much literary information. [The best edition of the treatise de Re Rusticâ is that contained in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ of Gesner, Lips, 1735, 2 vols. in 4to. or in the same edited by Schneider, Lips. 1794-97, 7 vols. 8vo. The best edition of the treatise de Lingua Latinâ is that printed at Dordrecht, 1619, 8vo.] Cic. in Acad. &c.—Quintil.—Attacinus, a native of Gaul, in the age of J. Cæsar. He translated into Latin verse the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctness and elegance. He also wrote a poem, entitled de Bello Sequanico, besides epigrams and elegies. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. He failed in his attempt to write satire. Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 46.—Ovid. Am. 1, v. 15.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

VARUS, QUINTILIUS, a Roman proconsul, descended from an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy under Arminius, crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that every thing was lost, he killed himself, A. D. 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus at Rome by one of the barbarian chiefs, as also his body; and so great was the influence of this defeat upon the emperor, that he continued for whole months to show all the marks of dejection and of deep sorrow, often exclaiming, "O Varus, restore me my legions." The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. Varus has been taxed with indolence and cowardice: and some have intimated, that if he had not trusted too much to the insinuations of the barbarian chiefs, he might have not only escaped ruin, but awed the Germans to their duty. His avarice was also conspicuous; he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat. 1, od. 24.—Patere. 2, c. 117.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 6.—The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.—Quintilius, a friend of Horace and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, Art. P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death. Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war. (vid. Varius.)—Lucius, an epicurean philosopher intimate with J. Cæsar. Some suppose that it was to him that Virgil inscribed his sixth eclogue. He is commended by Quintil. 6, c. 3, 78.—Alfrenus, a Roman, who, though originally a shoe-maker, became consul, and distinguished himself by his abilities as an orator. He was buried at the public expense, an honour granted to few, and only to persons of merit. Horat. 1, sat. 3.—Accius, one of the friends of Cato in Africa, &c.—A river which falls into the Mediterranean to the west of Nice, after separating Liguria from Gallia Narbonensis. Lucan. 1, v. 404.

VASCÓNES, [a people of Spain, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, in what is now the kingdom of Navarre; their chief town was Pampelo, now Pampeluna.] They were so reduced by a famine by Metellus, that they

VATICĀNUS, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great esteem. [It derived its name either from the circumstance of the Romans getting possession of it, by expelling the Tuscan, according to the counsel of the sooth-sayers (vates), or else from the predictions uttered there.] It was disregarded by the Romans on account of the unwholesomeness of the air, and the continual stench of the filth that was there, and of stagnated waters. Hellogabalus was the first who cleared it of all disagreeable nuisances. It is now admired for ancient monuments and pillars, for a celebrated public library, and for the palace of the pope. Horat. 1, od. 20.

VĀTIĒNUS, now Saterno, a river rising in the Alps and falling into the Po. Martial. 3, ep. 67.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

VĀTINIA LEX, de provinciis, by the tribune P. Vatinius, A. U. C. 694. It appointed Cæsar governor of Gallia Cisalpina and Illyricum, for five years, without a decree of the senate, or the usual custom of casting lots. Some persons were also appointed to attend him as lieutenants without the interference of the senate. His army was to be paid out of the public treasury, and he was empowered to plant a Roman colony in the town of Novocomum in Gaul.—Another, by P. Vatinius the tribune, A. U. C. 694, de repetundis, for the better management of the trial of those who were accused of extortion.

VATINIUS, an intimate friend of Cicero, once distinguished for his enmity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption, whence excessive hatred became proverbial in the words Vatinnanum Odium. Catull. 14, v. 3.—A shoemaker, ridiculed for his deformities and the oddity of his character. He was one of Nero's favourites, and he surpassed the rest of the courtiers in flattery, and in the commission of every impious deed. Large cups of no value are called Vatiniiani from him, because he used one which was both ill-shaped and uncouth. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 34.—Juv.—Mart. 14, ep. 96.

UBII, a people of Germany near the Rhine, transported across the river by Agrippa, who gave them the name of Agrippinenses, from his daughter Agrippina, who had been born in the country. Their chief town, Colonia Agrippina, is now Cologne. Tacit. G. 28, Ann. 12, c. 27.—Plin. 4, c. 17.—Cæs. 4, c. 30.

UCĀLĒGON, a Trojan chief, remarkable for his great age, and praised for the soundness of his counsels and his good intentions, though accused by some of betraying his country to the enemy. His house was first set on fire by the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312.—Homer. Il. 3, v. 148.

UCŪBIS, now Lucubi, a town of Spain. Hirtius.

UDINA, or VEDINUM, now Udino, a town of Italy.

VECTONES. (vid. Vettones.)

VEDIUS POLLIO, a friend of Augustus, very cruel to his servants, &c. (vid. Pollio.)

VEGETIUS, a Latin writer, who flourished B. C. 386, [in the reign of the emperor Valentinian, to whom he dedicated his treatise de Re Militari. Although probably a military man, his Latinity was pure for the age in which he lived. Modern critics distinguish between this writer and the Vegetius who composed a treatise on the veterinary art.] The best edition, together with Modestus, is that of Paris, 4to. 1607.

VEIENTES, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribe they composed was called Veientina. (vid. Veii.)

VEII, a powerful city of Etruria, at the distance of about 12 miles from Rome. It sustained many long wars against the Romans, and was at last taken and destroyed by Camillus, after a siege of ten years. At the time of its destruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its situation was so eligible, that the Romans, after the burning of the city by the Gauls, were long inclined to migrate there, and totally abandon their native home, and this would have been carried into execution if not opposed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. Ovid. 2. Fast. v. 195.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 44.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 143.—Liv. 5, c. 21, &c.

VEJÓVIS, or VEJUPITER, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill, built by Romulus. Some suppose that he was the same as Jupiter the infant, or in the cradle, because he was represented without thunder, or a sceptre, and had only by his side the goat Amalthea, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 430.

VELABRUM, a marshy piece of ground on the side of the Tiber, between the Aventine, Palatine, and Capitoline hills, which Augustus drained, and where he built houses. The place was frequented as a market, where oil, cheese, and other commodities were exposed to sale. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 229.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 401.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Plaut. 3, cap. 1, v. 29.

VELIA, [vid. Elea.] Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Cic. Phil. 10, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 366.—An eminence near the Roman forum, where Poplicola built himself a house. Liv. 2, c. 6.—Cic. 7, Att. 15.

VELINA, a part of the city of Rome adjoining Mount Palatine. It was also one of the Roman tribes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 52.—Cic. 4, ad Attic. ep. 15.

VELINUS, a lake in the country of the Sabines, formed by the stagnant waters of the Velinus, between some hills near Reate. The river Velinus rises in the Appenines, and after it has formed the lake, it falls into the Nar, near Interamna. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.—Cic. Div. 1, c. 36.

VELITERNA, or VELITRÆ, an ancient town of Latium on the Appian road, 20 miles at the east of Rome. The inhabitants were called Veliterni. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 12, &c.—Sueton. in Aug.—Ital. 8, v. 378, &c.

VELLAÜNODÜNUM, a town of the Senones, now Beaune. Cæs. 7, c. 11.

VELLËDA, a woman famous among the Germans, in the age of Vespasian, and worshipped as a deity. Tacuet. de Germ. 8.

VELLEIUS PATERCÛLUS, a Roman historian, descended from an equestrian family of Campania. [The year of his birth is commonly fixed at 19 B. C. the same year in which Virgil died.] He was at first a military tribune in the Roman armies, and for nine years served under Tiberius in the various expeditions which he undertook in Gaul and Germany. Velleius wrote an epitome of the history of Greece, and of Rome, and of other nations of the most remote antiquity, but of this authentic composition there remain only fragments of the history of Greece and Rome from the conquest of Perseus by Paulus, to the 17th year of the reign of Tiberius, in two books. It is a judicious account of celebrated men, and illustrious cities; the historian is happy in his descriptions, and accurate in his dates, his pictures are true, and his narrations lively and interesting. The whole is candid and impartial, but only till the reign of the Cæsars, when the writer began to be influenced by the presence of the emperor or the power of his favourites. Paterculus is deservedly censured for his invectives against Cicero and Pompey, and his encomiums on the cruel Tiberius, and the unfortunate Sejanus. Some suppose that he was involved in the ruin of this disappointed courtier, whom he had extolled as a pattern of virtue and morality. [The work of Paterculus is entitled "Historia Romana," but it is possible that this appellation may be owing to the copyists. A single manuscript of the work was preserved at the convent Murbach in Alsace, where Beatus Rhenanus found it. This manuscript, which was in a very bad condition, was subsequently lost. Its place is supplied by the edition of Rhenanus, published in 1520, and by a collation of the manuscript, made by Burer before Rhenanus returned it to the convent from which he had borrowed it. This collation is added to the edition of 1546. The history of Paterculus does not enter into details. It is a general picture of the times rather than a narrative of individual events. The historian states merely results, and is silent respecting the causes which combined to produce them. He loves, however, to develop and draw the characters of the principal actors, and his work is filled with delineations traced by the hand of a master. We find in him also a great many political and moral observations, the fruit of experience and foreign travel. In his style he imitates the concise and energetic manner of Sallust. His diction is pure and elegant, without, however, being wholly free from affectation, which shows itself in the search for archaisms or antiquated forms of expressions, and in the too frequent use of moral sentences and figures of rhetoric. Some Hellenisms are also found in him. The charge of adulation to his prince, which is so often brought against this historian, may find some palliation in the fact that it was not until after the death of Sejanus that the tyrannical spirit of Tiberius began openly and fully to develop itself; and of this, if Velleius was involved in the fate of Sejanus, he could not of course have been a witness. Besides, Tiberius had been the military chief, and the benefactor of Paterculus. The latter praises the good deeds he performed, he exaggerates his merit, he treats with indulgence his faults; but he does not push flattery so far as blindly to alter the truth, or assert things that are false. It is unjust, therefore, on account of this venial failing, to rank Paterculus among historians who are undeserving of confidence. He is impartial in the recital of events of which he was not himself a witness. As for those which passed under his own eyes, where is the historian who, in writing the history of his own times, is wholly exempt from the charge of partiality?] The best editions of Paterculus are those of Ruhkenius, 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1779; of Barbou, Paris, 12mo. 1777; of Burman, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719; [but above all that of Krause, Lips. 1800, 8vo.] —Caius, the grandfather of the historian of that name, was one of the friends of Livia. He killed himself when old and unable to accompany Livia in her flight.

VENETI, a people of Italy in Cisalpine Gaul, near the mouths of the Po. They were descended from a nation of Paphlagonia, [vid. Heneti,] who settled there under Antenor some time after the Trojan war. The Venetians, who have been long a powerful and commercial nation, were originally very poor; whence a writer in the age of the Roman emperors said, that they had no other fence against the waves of the sea but hurdles, no food but fish, no wealth besides their fishing-boats, and no merchandize but salt. [On the invasion of Italy, in the fifth century, by the Huns, under their king Attila, and the general desolation that every where appeared, great numbers of the people who lived near the Adriatic, took shelter in these islands in this quarter, where now stands the city of Venice. These islands had previously, in A. D. 421, been built upon by the inhabitants of Patavium for the purpose of commerce. The arrival of fresh hordes of Barbarians in Italy increased their population until a commercial state was formed, which gradually rose to power and opulence.] As regards the origin of the ancient Veneti, there is every appearance of fable in the commonly received account of their having come originally from the coast of Paphlagonia in Asia Minor. Mannert has started a learned and plausible theory, in which he maintains with great ability, the northern origin of the Veneti. According to this writer, they were a branch of the great Slavonic race. His grounds for this opinion are, 1. the fact of the Veneti being not an Aboriginal people in Italy; 2. the analogy of their name with that of the Vandals, both being derived from the old Teutonic word wenden, and denoting a roving and unsteady mode of life; and 3. from the existence of the amber trade among them, and the proof which this furnishes of a communication, by an overland trade, between them and the nations inhabiting the shores of the Baltic and the countries of the north. *Mannert's Geographie der Griechen und Roemer. vol. 10, p. 54, seq.] Strab. 4, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 23, l. 2, c. 4.—Cæs. VENTI. The ancients, and especially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them sacrifices as to deities, intent upon the destruction of mankind, by continually causing storms, tempests, and earthquakes. The winds were represented in different attitudes and forms. The four principal winds were Eurus, the south-east; who is represented as a young man flying with great impetuosity, and often appearing in a playsome and wanton humour. Auster, the south-wind, appeared generally as an old man with grey hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a sable vesture, and dusky wings. He is the dispenser of rain and of all heavy showers. Zephyrus is represented as the mildest of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora, the goddess, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect felicity. Boreas, or the north-east wind, appears always rough and shivering. He is the father of rain, snow, hail, and tempests, and is always represented as surrounded with impenetrable clouds. Those of inferior note were, Solanus, whose name is seldom mentioned. [He is more commonly styled Subsolanus, in Greek Apeliotes, and answers to the east.] He appeared as a young man holding fruit in his lap, such as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or south-west, represented with black wings, and a melancholy countenance. Corus, or north-west, drives clouds of snow before him, and Aquilo, north-east [by north,] is equally dreadful in appearance. The name is derived from Aquila, an eagle, to denote the swiftness and impetuosity of this wind.] The winds, according to some mythologists, were confined in a large cave of which Æolus had the management, and without this necessary precaution they would have overturned the earth, and reduced every thing to its original chaos. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 57, &c.

VENTIDIUS BASSUS, a native of Picenum, born of an obscure family. When Asculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphant chariot of Pompeius Strabo, hanging on his mother's breast. A bold aspiring soul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæsar, raised him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the state. He displayed valour in the Roman armies, and gradually arose to the offices of tribune, prætor, high-priest, and consul. He made war against the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B. C. 39. He was the first Roman ever honoured with a triumph over Parthia. He died greatly lamented by all the Roman people, and was buried at the public expense. Plut. in Anton.—Juv. 7, v. 199.

VENULUS, one of the Latin elders sent into Magna Græcia to demand the assistance of Diomedes, &c. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 9.

VENUS, one of the most celebrated deities of the ancients. [vid. end of this article.] She was the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces and of pleasures, and the patroness of courtezans. Some mythologists speak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania, the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularia, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero speaks of four, a daughter of Cœlus and Light, one sprung from the froth of the sea, a third, a daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Dione, and a fourth born at Tyre, and the same as the Astarte of the Syrians. Of these, however, the Venus sprung from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the most known; and of her in particular ancient mythologists as well as painters make mention. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or, according to Hesiod, of Cythera, whither she was wafted by the zephyrs, and received on the sea-shore by the seasons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was soon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddesses became jealous of her personal charms.

Jupiter attempted to gain her affections, and even wished to offer her violence, but Venus refused, and the god, to punish her obstinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed son Vulcan: This marriage did not prevent the goddess of Love from gratifying her favourite passions, and she defiled her husband's bed by her amours with the gods. Her intrigue with Mars is the most celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and exposed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. (vid. Electryon.) Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid, and Anteros, by Mars; by Mercury, she had Hermaphroditus; by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis made her abandon the seats of Olympus, (vid. Adonis), and her regard for Anchises led her often to visit the woods and solitary retreats of Mount Ida. (vid. Anchises, Æneas.) The power of Venus over the heart was supported and assisted by a celebrated girdle, called ζώνη by the Greeks, and cestus by the Latins. This mysterious girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; it excited love and rekindled extinguished flames. Juno herself was indebted to this powerful ornament to gain the favours of Jupiter, and Venus, though herself possessed of every charm, no sooner put on her cestus, than Vulcan, unable to resist the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The contest of Venus for the golden apple of Discord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno, (vid. Paris, Discordia), and rewarded her judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the ancients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who presided over generation, and by whose influence alone mankind existed. In her sacrifices, and in the festivals celebrated in her honour, too much licentiousness prevailed, and public prostitution was often part of the ceremony. Victims were seldom offered to her, or her altars stained with blood, though we find Aspasia making repeated sacrifices. No pigs, however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple, were sacred to Venus; and among birds, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow, were her favourites; and among fishes, those called the aphya and the lycostomus. The goddess of beauty was represented among the ancients in different forms. At Elis she appeared seated on a goat, with one foot resting on a tortoise. At Sparta and Cythera she was represented armed like Minerva, and sometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter Olympius she was represented by Phidias as rising from the sea, received by love, and crowned by the goddess of persuasion. At Cnidos her statue, made by Praxiteles, represented her naked, with one hand hiding what modesty keeps concealed. Her statue at Elephantis was the same, with only a naked Cupid by her side. In Sicily she held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple, while on her head she had a crown, which terminated in a point, to intimate the pole. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves, or at other times by swans or sparrows. The surnames of the goddess are numerous, and only serve to show how well established her worship was all over the earth. She was called Cypria, because particularly worshipped in the island of Cyprus, and in that character she was often represented with a beard, and the male parts of generation, with a sceptre in her hand, and the body and dress of a female; whence she is called duplex Amathusa by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, because worshipped at Paphos, where she had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though exposed in the open air. Some of the ancients called her Apostrophia, or Epistrophia, as also Venus Urania, and Venus Pandemos. The first of these she received as presiding over wantonness and incestuous enjoyment; the second because she patronized pure love, and chaste and moderate gratifications; and the third because she favoured the propensities of the vulgar, and was fond of sensual pleasures. The Cnidians raised her temples under the name of Venus Acrea, of Doris, and of Euploea. In her temple, under the name of Euploea, at Cnidos, was the most celebrated of her statues, being the most perfect piece of Praxiteles. It was made with white marble, and appeared so engaging, and so much like life, that, according to some historians, a youth of the place became violently enamoured of the cold and lifeless image. Venus was also surnamed Cytherea, because she was the chief deity of Cythera; Exopolis, because her statue was without the city at Athens; Philommeis, because the queen of laughter; Telessigma, because she presided over marriage; Coliada, Colotis, or Colaus, because worshipped on a promontory of the same name in Attica; Area, because armed like Mars; Veritordia, because she could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chastity; Apaturia, because she deceived; Calva, because she was represented bald; Ericyna, because worshipped at Eryx; Etaira, because the patroness of courtizans; Acidalia, because of a fountain of Orchomenos; Basilea, because the queen of love; Myrtea, because the myrtle was sacred to her; Libertina, from her inclinations to gratify lust; Mechanitis, in allusion to the many artifices practised in love, &c. &c. As goddess of the sea, because born in the bosom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina, Limesia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Saligenia, Pontogenia, Aligena, Thalassia, &c. and as rising from the sea, the name of Anadyomene is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated paintings of Apelles, which represented her as issuing from the bosom of the waves, and wringing her tresses on her shoulder. vid. Anadyomene. [Some remarks relative to Venus will be found under the article Jupiter. The learned Ritter traces up the worship of Venus to the corruption of the great tradition respecting an universal deluge. Venus he makes the general principle of life, and her rising from the ocean a type of the world emerging from the waves of the deluge.] Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27, l. 3, c. 23.—*Orpheus. VENUSIA, or VENUSIUM, a town [in the southern part] of Apulia, where Horace was born. Part of the Roman army fled thither after the defeat of Cannæ. The town, though in ruins, contains still many pieces of antiquity, especially a marble bust preserved in the great square, and said falsely to be an original representation of Horace. Venusia was on the confines of Lucania, whence the poet said Lucanus an Apulus anceps, and it was founded by Diomedes, who called it Venusia or Aphrodisia after Venus whose divinity he wished to appease. Strab. 5 and 6.—Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 35.—Liv. 22, c. 54.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

C. VERRES, a Roman who governed the province of Sicily as prætor. The oppression and rapine of which he was guilty while in office, so offended the Sicilians that they brought an accusation against him before the Roman senate. Cicero undertook the cause of the Sicilians, and pronounced those celebrated orations which are still extant. Verres was defended by Hortensius; but as he despaired of the success of his defence, he left Rome without waiting for his sentence, and lived in great affluence in one of the provinces. [Of the six orations against Verres, only one was pronounced. Driven to despair by the depositions of the witnesses after the first oration, he submitted, without awaiting his sentence, to a voluntary exile. The other five orations of Cicero, forming the series of harangues which he intended to deliver after the proof was completed, were subsequently published in the same shape as if Verres had actually stood his trial, and was to have made a regular defence.] He was at last killed by the soldiers of Antony the triumvir, about 26 years after his voluntary exile from the capital. Cic. in Verr.—Plin. 34, c. 2.—Lactant. 2, c. 4.

VERRIUS FLACCUS, a freed-man and grammarian, famous for his powers in instructing. He was appointed over the grand-children of Augustus, and also distinguished himself by his writings. [His writings were historical and grammatical. Suetonius informs us that he caused to be incrustated on a semicircular building at Præneste twelve tablets of marble, on which was cut a Roman calendar, which Suetonius and Macrobius often cite. Four of these tablets, or rather fragments of them, were discovered in 1770, and published by Foggini in 1779. They contain the months of January, March, April, and December, and throw great light on the Fasti of Ovid. Verrius Flaccus was at the head of a celebrated school of grammarians. His principal work in this line was entitled, "De Verborum significatione." It was abridged by Festus, a grammarian of the 4th century. The abridgment has reached us, but the original work is lost.] Gell. 4, c. 5.—Suet. de Gram.

VERTUMNUS, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring and over orchards. He endeavoured to gain the affections of the goddess Pomona; and to effect this, he assumed the shape and dress of a fisherman, of a soldier, a peasant, a reaper, &c. but all to no purpose, till, under the form of an old woman, he prevailed upon his mistress and married her. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 642, &c.—Propert. 4, el. 2, v. 2.—Horat. 2, Sat. 7, v. 14.

VERUS, Lucius Cæionus Commodus, a Roman emperor, son of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the 7th year of his age by M. Aurelius, at the request of Adrian, and he married Lucilla, the daughter of his adopted father, who also took him as his colleague on the throne. He was sent by M. Aurelius to oppose the Barbarians in the east. His arms were attended with success, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honoured with a triumph at his return home, and soon after he marched with his imperial colleague against the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years and some months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and solemnity. Verus has been greatly censured for his debaucheries, which appeared more enormous and disgusting when compared to the temperance, meekness, and popularity of Aurelius. The example of his father did not influence him, and he often retired from the frugal and moderate repast of Aurelius to the profuse banquets of his own palace, where the night was spent in riot and debauchery with the meanest of the populace, with stage-dancers, buffoons, and lascivious courtizans. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than 12 guests, the emperor spent no less than six millions of sesterces, or about 32,200*l.* sterling. But it is to be observed, that whatever was most scarce and costly was there; the guests never drank twice out of the same cup; and whatever vessels they had touched they received as a present from the emperor when they left the palace. In his Parthian expedition, Verus did not check his vicious propensities; for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondness for a horse has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a statue of gold, he was fed with almonds and raisins by the hand of the emperor, he was clad in purple, and kept in the most splendid of the halls of the palace, and when dead, the emperor, to express his sorrow, raised him a magnificent monument on Mount Vatican. Some have suspected M. Aurelius of dispatching Verus to rid the world of his debaucheries and guilty actions; but this seems to be the report of malevolence.—L. Annæus, a son of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Palestine.—The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but, like his son, he disgraced himself by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

VESPASIANUS, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, descended from an obscure family at Reate. He was honoured with the consulship, not so much by the influence of the imperial courtiers as by his own private merit and his public services. He accompanied Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling asleep while he repeated one of his poetical compositions. This momentary resentment of the emperor did not prevent Vespasian from being sent to carry on a war against the Jews. His operations were crowned with success; many of the cities of Palestine surrendered, and Vespasian began the siege of Jerusalem. This was, however, achieved by the hands of his son Titus, and the death of Vitellius and the affection of his soldiers, hastened his rise, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Vespasian did not betray any signs of pride at so sudden and so unexpected an exaltation; and, though once employed in the mean office of a horse-doctor, he behaved, when invested with the imperial purple, with all the dignity and greatness which became a successor of Augustus. In the beginning of his reign Vespasian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans, and he took away an appointment which he had a few days before granted to a young nobleman, who approached him to return him thanks, all smelling of perfumes and covered with ointment, adding, I had rather you had smelt of garlick. He repaired the public buildings, embellished the city, and made the great roads more spacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for 10 years, Vespasian died with a pain in his bowels, A. D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the first Roman emperor that died a natural death, and he was also the first who was succeeded by his own son on the throne. Vespasian has been admired for his great virtues. He was clement, he gave no ear to flattery, and, for a long time, refused the title of father of his country, which was often bestowed upon the most worthless and tyrannical of the emperors. He despised informers, and rather than punish conspirators, he rewarded them with great liberality. When the king of Parthia addressed him with the superscription of Arsaces king of kings to Flavius Vespasianus, the emperor was no way dissatisfied with the pride and insolence of the monarch, and answered him again in his own words, Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces king of kings. To men of learning and merit Vespasian was very liberal: one hundred thousand sesterces were annually paid from the public treasury to the different professors that were appointed to encourage and promote the arts and sciences. Yet in spite of this apparent generosity, some authors have taxed Vespasian with avarice. According to their account he loaded the provinces with new taxes, he bought commodities that he might sell them to a greater advantage, and even laid an impost upon urine, which gave occasion to Titus to ridicule the meanness of his father. Vespasian, regardless of his son's observation, was satisfied to show him the money that was raised from so productive a tax, asking him at the same time whether it smelt offensive? His ministers were the most avaricious of his subjects, and the emperor used very properly to remark, that he treated them as sponges, by wetting them when dry, and squeezing them when they were wet. He has been accused of selling criminals their lives, and of condemning the most opulent to make himself master of their possessions. If, however, he was guilty of these meaner practices, they were all under the name of one of his concubines, who wished to enrich herself by the avarice and credulity of the emperor. *Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. VESSA, a town of Sicily.

VESTA, a goddess, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, sister to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologists with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proserpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When considered as the mother of the gods, she is the mother of Rhea and Saturn; and when considered as the patroness of the vestal virgins and the goddess of fire, she is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. (vid. the end of this article.) Under this last name she was worshipped by the Romans. Æneas was the first who introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple where no males were permitted to go. The Palladium of Troy was supposed to be preserved within her sanctuary; and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. (vid. Vestales.) If the fire of Vesta was ever extinguished, it was supposed to threaten the republic with some sudden calamity. The virgin by whose negligence it had been extinguished was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. The temple of Vesta was of a round form, and the goddess was represented in a long flowing robe, with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a Palladium. On some medals she appears holding a drum in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. [There were, properly speaking, two Vestas, the one the wife, the other the daughter, of Saturn. The former is the same with Terra, and was so called from her clothing the earth with plants and fruits, (a vestiendo); hence her temples were round, from the shape of the earth, and some even maintain that her image was orbicular: hence, too, the reason why she is represented holding a drum, because the earth contains the boisterous winds in its bosom. The other Vesta is the same with Fire, and her power was exercised about altars and houses; hence her name from ἱερία, lar, focus. This is the Vesta of whom the most frequent mention is made by the poets, and to whose service the vestal virgins belonged.] *Hesiod. VESTALES, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta, as their name indicates. This office was very ancient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the vestals. Æneas is supposed to have first chosen the vestals. Numa first appointed four, to which Tarquin added two. They were always chosen by the monarchs, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the high-priest was intrusted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins they were chosen young, from the age of six to ten; and if there was not a sufficient number that presented themselves as candidates for the office, twenty virgins were selected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become priestesses. Plebeians as well as patricians were permitted to propose themselves, but it was required that they should be born of a good family, and be without blemish or deformity in every part of their body. For thirty years they were to remain in the greatest continence; the ten first years were spent in learning the duties of the order, the ten following were employed in discharging them with fidelity and sanctity, and the ten last in instructing such as had entered the noviciate. When the thirty years were elapsed they were permitted to marry, or if they still preferred celibacy, they waited upon the rest of the vestals. As soon as a vestal was initiated, her head was shaved, to intimate the liberty of her person, as she was then free from the shackles of parental authority, and she was permitted to dispose of her possessions as she pleased. The employment of the vestals was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished; for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognostic of great calamities to the state; the offender was punished for her negligence, and severely scourged by the high-priest. In such a case all was consternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glasses with the rays of the sun. Another equally particular charge of the vestals was to keep a sacred pledge, on which depended the very existence of Rome, which, according to some, was the Palladium of Troy, or some of the mysteries of the gods of Samothrace. The privileges of the vestals were great; they had the most honourable seats at public games and festivals, a licitor with the fasces always preceded them when they walked in public, they were carried in chariots when they pleased, and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution, if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath, they were chosen as arbiters in cases of moment, and in the execution of wills; and so great was the deference paid them by the magistrates, as well as by the people, that the consuls themselves made way for them, and bowed their fasces when they passed before them. To insult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chastity was beaten to death with scourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honour granted to few. Such of the vestals as proved incontinent were punished in the most rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be stoned, but Tarquin the elder dug a large hole under the earth, where a bed was placed with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty vestal was stripped of the habit of the order, and compelled to descend into the subterraneous cavity, which was immediately shut, and she was left to die through hunger. Few of the vestals were guilty of incontinence; and for the space of one hundred years during which the order continued established, from the reign of Numa, only 18 were punished for the violation of their vow. The vestals were abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished. The dress of the vestals was peculiar; they wore a white vest with purple borders, a white linen surplice, called linteum supernum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered sacrifices. They had a close covering on their head, called infula, from which hung ribbons, or vittæ. Liv. 2, &c.—Plut. in Num. &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 30.—Flor. 1.—Propert. 4, el. 11.—Tacit. 4, c. 10.

VESTĀLIA, festivals in honour of Vesta, observed at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houses, and meat was sent to the vestals to be offered to the gods, millstones were decked with garlands, and the asses that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the procession bare-footed to the temple of the goddess, and an altar was erected to Jupiter surnamed Pistor. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 305.

VESTĀLIUM MATER, a title given by the senate to Livia, the mother of Tiberius, with the permission to sit among the vestal virgins at plays. Tacit. 4, An. c. 16.

VESTĪNI, a people of Italy near the Sabines, famous for the making of cheese. [They were situate between the Prætutii and Marucini, and answer now to a part of Abruzzo.] Plin. 3, c. 5.—Martial. 13, ep. 31.—Strab. 5.

VESUVIUS. (vid. Vesuvius.)

VESŪLUS, now Viso, a large mountain of Liguria; [it was in the range of the Alpes Maritimæ,] where the Po takes its rise. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 703.—Plin. 3, c. 19.

VESŪVIUS, [a mountain of Campania, about six miles south-east of Naples, celebrated for its volcano. It has two summits, the most northern of which is called Somma, the other is properly called Vesuvius. Somma is supposed to have been part of the cone of a larger volcano, nearly concentric with its present cone, which, in some great eruption has destroyed all but this fragment. From the building of Rome to the year 79 of our era, a period of 7 centuries, Vesuvius appears to have been in a state of profound repose, as no mention is made of any eruption during that time; and the ancient writers, who refer to this mountain, speak only of its extraordinary beauty and fertility. There were, however, certain appearances near the summit, which left no doubt of its prior volcanic state; and the cities in its vicinity were paved with the lavas of ancient eruptions. Vitruvius, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Silius Italicus, and other ancient writers allude to previous eruptions of this mountain. The first great eruption on record took place on the 24th of August, A. D. 79, and on the same day the towns of Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Stabia were buried under showers of volcanic sand, stones, and scoriae. Such was the immense quantity of volcanic sand, (called ashes,) thrown out during this eruption, that the whole country was involved in pitchy darkness; and, according to Dion, the ashes fell in Egypt, Syria, and various parts of Asia Minor. This eruption proved fatal to the elder Pliny. He had the command of the Roman fleet on the coast of Campania, and, wishing to succour those persons who might wish to escape by sea, and also to observe this grand phenomenon more nearly, he left the cape of Misenum and approached the side of the bay nearest to Vesuvius. He landed, and advanced towards it, but was suffocated by the sulphureous vapour. After this, Vesuvius continued a burning mountain for nearly a thousand years, having eruptions at intervals. The fire then appeared to become nearly extinct, and continued so from the beginning of the 12th to that of the 16th century. Since the eruption of 1506 it has remained burning to the present time, with eruptions of lava and ashes at intervals. Vesuvius rises to the height of 3600 feet above the sea.] *Dio. VETERA CASTRA, a Roman encampment in Germany, which became a town, now Santen, near Cleves. Tacit. H. 4, c. 18. An. 1, c. 45.

VETTIUS, Sp. a Roman senator who was made interrex at the death of Romulus till the election of another king. He nominated Numa, and resigned his office. Plut. in Num.—A Roman knight who became enamoured of a young female at Capua, and raised a tumult amongst the slaves who proclaimed him king. He was betrayed by one of his adherents, upon which he laid violent hands on himself.

VETTŌNES, VETONES, or VECTONES, an ancient name of Spain. [They occupied what is now the province of Estremadura.] Sil. 3, v. 378.—Plin. 25, c. 8.

VETULŌNIA, one of the chief cities of Etruria, [near the promontory of Populonium,] whose hot waters were famous. The Romans were said to have derived the badges of their magisterial offices from thence. Plin. 2, c. 103, l. 8, c. 3.—Ital. 8, v. 484.

VETŪRIA, one of the Roman tribes, divided into the two branches of the Juni and Senii. It received its name from the Veturian family, which was originally called Vetustian. Liv. 36.—The mother of Coriolanus. She was solicited by all the Roman matrons to go to her son with her daughter-in-law, and intreat him not to make war against his country. She went and prevailed over Coriolanus, and for her services to the state, the Roman senate offered to reward her as she pleased. She only asked to raise a temple to the goddess of female fortune, which was done on the very spot where she had pacified her son.—Liv. 2, c. 40.—Dionys. Hal. 7, &c.

VETURIUS, a Roman artist who made shields for Numa. [vid. Manurius.]—A consul defeated by the Samnites, and obliged to pass under the yoke with great ignominy.

UFENS, a river of Italy near Terracina. [vid. Pontinæ Paludes.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 392.—Another river of Picenum. Liv. 5, c. 35.—A prince who assisted Turnus against Æneas. The Trojan monarch made a vow to sacrifice his four sons to appease the maens of his friend Pallas, in the same manner as Achilles is represented killing some Trojan youths on the tomb of Patroclus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 745, l. 10, v. 518. He was afterwards killed by Gyas. Ib. 12, v. 460.

UFENSLINA, a Roman tribe first created A. U. C. 435, with the tribe Falerina, in consequence of the great increase of population at Rome. Liv. 9, c. 20.—Festus.

VIA ÆMYLIA, a celebrated road made by the consul M. Æmilius Lepidus, A. U. C. 567. It led with the Flaminian road to Aquileia. There was also another of the same name in Etruria, which led from Pisæ to Dertona.—Appia, was made by the censor Appius, and led from Rome to Capua, and from Capua to Brundisium, at the distance of 350 miles, which the Romans call a five days' journey. It passed successively through the towns and stages of Aricia, Forum Appii, Terracina, Fundi, Minturnæ, Sinuessa, Capua, Caudium, Beneventum, Equotiticum, Herdonia, Canusium, Barium, Egnatia, to Brundisium. It was called by way of eminence, regina viarum, made so strong, and the stones so well cemented together, that it remained entire for many hundred years. Some parts of it are still to be seen in the neighbourhood of Naples. Appius carried it only 130 miles, as far as Capua, A. U. C. 442, and it was finished as far as Brundisium by Augustus.—There was also another road, called Minucia or Numicia, which led to Brundisium, but by what places is now uncertain.—Flaminia was made by the censor Flaminius, A. U. C. 533. It led from the Campus Martius to the modern town of Rimini, on the Adriatic, through the country of the Osci and Etrurians, for the distance of about 360 miles.—Lata, one of the ancient streets of Rome.—Valeria led from Rome to the country of the Marsi, through the territories of the Sabines. There were besides many streets and roads of inferior note, such as the Aurelia, Cassia, Campania, Ardetina, Laticana, Domitiana, Ostiensis, Prænestina, &c. all of which were made and constantly kept in repair at the public expense.

VIADRUS, the classical name of the Oder, which rises in Moravia and falls by three mouths into the Baltic. Ptol.

VIBIUS, a Roman who refused to pay any attention to Cicero when banished, though he had received from him the most unbounded favours.—Siculus. [vid. Sica.]—Sequester, a Latin writer, whose treatise de Fluminibus, &c. is best edited by Oberlinus, 8vo. Argent. 1778.

VIBO, a town of Lucania, anciently called Hipponium and Hippo. Cic. ad. Att. 3, c. 3. —Plin. 3, c. 5.—A town of Spain—of the Brutii.

VICA POTIA, a goddess of Rome, who presided over victory (a vincere and potiri). Liv. 2, c. 7. [vid. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 2.]

VICENTIA, or VICETIA, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, at the north-west of [Patavium. It is now Vicenza] Tacit. Hist. 3.

VICUS LONGUS, a street of Rome, where an altar was raised to the goddess Pudicitia, or the modesty of the Plebeians. Liv. 10, c. 23.—Cyprius, a place on the Esquiline hill, where the Sabines dwelt.

VICTOR, SEXT. AURELIUS, a writer in the age of Constantius. He gave the world a concise history of the Roman emperors, from the age of Augustus to his own time, or A. D. 360. He also wrote an abridgment of the Roman history, before the age of Julius Cæsar, which is now extant, and ascribed by different authors to C. Nepos, to Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, &c. Victor was greatly esteemed by the emperors, and honoured with the consulship. [There were two historians of this name. The first has the term Major (Elder) usually added to his name, for distinction sake from the other who is styled Minor (Younger). The second flourished about the same time with Orosius, and abridged the work of the former, which abridgment he entitled "Epitome de Cæsaribus;" or, according to others, "De vita et moribus Imperatorum Romanorum." He continued this to the death of Theodosius the Great. He made also some changes in the original, and added new facts or circumstances.] The best editions of Victor are that of Pitsiscus, 8vo. Utr. 1696, and that of Artuzenius, 4to. Amst. 1733.

VICTORIA, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Νίκη, supposed to be the daughter of the giant Pallas, or Titan and Styx. The goddess of victory was sister to Strength and Valour, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honoured by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raised her a temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honour. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand. A golden statue of this goddess, weighing 320 pounds, was presented to the Romans by Hiero, king of Syracuse, and deposited in the temple of Jupiter, on the Capitoline hill. Liv. 22.—Varro de L. L.—Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin. prof. fab.—Suet.

VICTORINA, a celebrated matron who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson of the same name, were declared emperors, but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites called Tetricus. She was some time after poisoned, A. D. 269, and, according to some, by Tetricus himself.

VICTORINUS, [an African philosopher, who became a convert to Christianity, and flour-rished in the 4th century. He gained such a degree of reputation by teaching rhetoric at Rome, that a statue was erected to him in one of the public places. He was led to the perusal of the Scriptures by the study of Plato's works. He was the author of several works of no great value contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum.]

VIDUCASSES, a people of Normandy. Plin. 4, c. 18.

VIENNA, a town of Gallia Narbonensis on the Rhone, below Lyons. [It is now Vienna. The classical name for modern Vienna is Vindobona.] Strab. 1.—Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 9.

VILLIA LEX, animalis or annaria, by L. Villius, the tribune, A. U. C. 574, defused the proper age required for exercising the office of a magistrate, 25 years for the quætorship, 27 or 28 for the ædileship, or tribuneship, for the office of prætor 30, and for that of consul 43. Liv. 11, c. 44.

VILLIUS, a tribune of the people, author of the Villian law, and thence called Annalis, a surname borne by his family. Liv. 11, c. 44.—Publius, a Roman ambassador sent to Antiochus. He held a conference with Annibal, who was at the monarch's court.

VIMINĀLIS, one of the seven hills on which Rome was built, so called from the number of ozers (vimines) which grew there. Servius Tullius first made it part of the city. Jupiter had a temple there, whence he was called Viminalis. Liv. 1, c. 44.—Varro L. L. 4, c. 8.

VINALIA, festivals at Rome in honour of Jupiter and Venus.

VINCENTIUS, one of the Christian fathers, A. D. 434, whose works are best edited by Baluzius, Paris, 1669.

VINDELICĪ, an ancient people of Germany between the heads of the Rhine and the Danube. Their country, which was called Vindelicia, forms now part of Swabia and Bavaria, and their chief town, Augusta Vindelicorum, is now Augsburg. [This nation derived their name from the two rivers which water their territory, viz. the Vindo and Licus, now the Wertach and the Lech. In the angle formed by the two rivers their capital was situate.] Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 18.

VINDEMIĀTOR, a constellation that rose about the nodes of March. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 407.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

VINDEX JULIUS, a governor of Gaul, who revolted against Nero, and determined to deliver the Roman empire from his tyranny. He was followed by a numerous army, but at last defeated by one of the emperor's generals. When he perceived that all was lost, he laid violent hands upon himself, 68 A. D. Sueton. in Galb.—Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 51.—Plin. 9, ep. 19.

VINDICIUS, a slave who discovered the conspiracy which some of the most noble of the Roman citizens had formed to restore Tarquin to his throne. He was amply rewarded, and made a citizen of Rome. Liv. 2, c. 5.—Plut. in Popl.

VINDONISSA, now Wendish, a town of the Helvetii on the Aar, in the territory of Berne. Tacit. 4, Hist. 61 and 70.

VINDIDIUS, a miser mentioned by Horace, 1 Sat. 1, v. 95. Some manuscripts read Numidius and Umidius.

T. VINIUS, a commander in the pretorian guards, intimate with Galba, of whom he became the first minister. He was honoured with the consulship, and some time after murdered. Tacit. H. 1, c. 11, 42 and 48.—Plut.

VIPSANIA, a daughter of M. Agrippa, mother of Drusus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when she had been repudiated she married Asinius Gallus. Tacit. A. 1, c. 12, l. 3, c. 19.

VIRBIUS, (qui inter viros bis fuit,) a name given to Hippolytus after he had been brought back to life by Æsculapius, at the instance of Diana, who pitied his unfortunate end. Virgil makes him son of Hippolytus. Æn. 7, v. 762.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 544.—Hygin. fab. 251.

PUBL. VIRGĪLIUS MARO, called the prince of the Latin poets, was born at Andes, a village near Mantua, about 70 years before Christ, on the 15th of October. His first years were spent at Cremona, where his taste was formed, and his rising talents first exercised. The distribution of the lands of Cremona to the soldiers of Augustus, after the battle of Philippi, nearly proved fatal to the poet, and when he attempted to dispute the possession of his fields with a soldier, Virgil was obliged to save his life from the resentment of the lawless veteran, by swimming across a river. This was the beginning of his greatness; he with his father repaired to Rome, where he soon formed an acquaintance with Mæcenas, and recommended himself to the favours of Augustus. The emperor restored his lands to the poet, whose modest muse knew so well how to pay the tribute of gratitude, and his first bucolic was written to thank the patron, as well as to tell the world, that his favours were not unworthily bestowed. The ten bucolics were written in about three years. The poet showed his countrymen that he could write with graceful simplicity, with elegance, delicacy of sentiment, and with purity of language. Some time after Virgil undertook the Georgics, a poem the most perfect and finished of all Latin compositions. The Æneid was begun, as some suppose, at the particular request of Augustus, and the poet, while he attempted to prove that the Julian family was lineally descended from the founder of Lavinium, visibly described, in the pious and benevolent character of his hero, the amiable qualities of his imperial patron. The great merit of this poem is well known, and it will ever remain undecided, which of the two poets, either Homer or Virgil, is more entitled to our praise, our applause, and our admiration. The writer of the Iliad stood as a pattern to the favourite of Augustus. The voyage of Æneas is copied from the Odyssey, and for his battles, Virgil found a model in the wars of Troy, and the animated descriptions of the Iliad. The poet died before he had revised this immortal work, which had already engaged his time for eleven successive years. He had attempted to attend his patron in the east, but he was detained at Naples on account of his ill health. He, however, went to Athens, where he met Augustus in his return, but he soon after fell sick at Megara, and, though indisposed, he ordered himself to be removed to Italy. He landed at Brundisium, where a few days after he expired, the 22d of September, in the 51st year of his age, B. C. 19. He left the greatest part of his possessions to his friends, particularly to Mæcenas, Tucca, and Augustus; and he ordered, as his last will, his unfinished poem to be burnt. These last injunctions were disobeyed; and, according to the words of an ancient poet, Augustus saved his favourite Troy from a second and more dismal conflagration. The poem was delivered by the emperor to three of his literary friends. They were ordered to revise and to expunge whatever they deemed improper; but they were strictly conjoined not to make any additions; and hence, as some suppose, the causes that so many lines of the Æneid are unfinished, particularly in the last books. The body of the poet, according to his own directions, was conveyed to Naples, and interred with much solemnity, in a monument erected on the road that leads from Naples to Puteoli. [vid. the end of this article.] The following modest distich was engraved on the tomb, written by the poet some few moments before he expired:

Parthenope: cecini pascua, rura, duces.

The Romans were not insensible of the merit of their poet. Virgil received much applause in the capital, and when he entered the theatre, he was astonished and delighted to see the crowded audience rise up to him as an emperor, and welcome his approach by reiterated plaudits. He was naturally modest, and of a timorous disposition. When people crowded to gaze upon him, or pointed at him with the finger with raptures, the poet blushed, and stole away from them, and often hid himself in shops to be removed from the curiosity and the admiration of the public. The most liberal and gratifying marks of approbation he received were from the emperor and from Octavia. He attempted in his Æneid to paint the virtues, and lament the premature death of the son of Octavia, and he was desired by the emperor to repeat the lines in the presence of the afflicted mother. He had no sooner begun O nate, &c. than Octavia burst into tears; he continued, but he had artfully suppressed the name of her son, and when he repeated in the 16th line the well known words, Tu Marcellus eris, the princess swooned away, and the poet withdrew, but not without being liberally rewarded. Octavia presented him ten sestertia for every one of his verses in praise of her son, the whole of which was nearly equivalent to 2000*l.* English money. As an instance of his modesty, the following circumstance has been recorded: Virgil wrote this distich, in which he compared his patron to Jupiter,

Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet,* and placed it in the night on the gates of the palace of Augustus. Inquiries were made for the author by order of Augustus, and when Virgil had the diffidence not to declare himself, Bathyllus, a contemptible poet of the age, claimed the verses as his own, and was liberally rewarded. This displeased Virgil; he again wrote the verses near the palace, and under them with the beginning of another line in these words,

Sic vos non vobis,

Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves;

proved himself to be the author of the distich, and the poetical usurper became the sport and ridicule of Rome. In the works of Virgil we can find a more perfect and satisfactory account of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Romans than in all the other Latin poets, Ovid excepted. Every thing he mentions is founded upon historical truth; and though he borrowed much from his predecessors, and even whole lines from Ennius, yet he has had the happiness to make it all his own. He was uncommonly severe in revising his own poetry, and he used often to compare himself to a bear that licks her cubs into shape. In his connexions, Virgil was remarkable, his friends enjoyed his unbounded confidence, and his library and possessions seemed to be the property of the public. Like other great men he was not without his enemies and detractors in his lifetime, but from their aspersions he received additional lustre. [Virgil's tomb is said to be above the entrance of the grotto Pausilipo. (vid. Pausilipus.) A vaulted cell and two modern windows above present themselves to view. The poet's name is the only ornament of the place. No sarcophagus, no urn, nor even any inscriptions are seen. The epitaph, though not genuine, is yet ancient, and was inscribed by order of the Duke of Pescolangiano, the proprietor of the place, on a marble slab, placed in the side of the rock, opposite the entrance. An Italian author states that he himself had seen, about the year 1256, the urn supposed to contain the poet's ashes; that it was standing in the middle of the sepulchre, supported by nine little pillars, with the epithet inccribed on its frieze. He adds that Robert of Anjou, apprehensive for the safety of such a relic during the civil wars, took the urn and pillars to Castel-Nuovo. It seems that so much care was taken of them, that they were concealed too well to be ever afterwards discovered. Cluverius, Addison, and other writers, however, treat the whole story, very properly, as a mere fable, and even assert that this is not Virgil's tomb.] Among the very numerous and excellent editions of Virgil, these few may be collected as the best: that of Masvicius, 2 vols. 4to. Leovardiae, 1717; of Baskerville, 4to. Birmingham, 1757; of the Variorum, in 8vo. L. Bat. 1661; of Heyne, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1767; of Edinburgh, 2 vols. 12mo. 1755; and of Glasgow, 12mo. 1758. Pat. c. 2, c. 36.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 40.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 61.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 51.—Mart. 8, ep. 56.—Jul. 11, v. 178.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 3, ep. 21.— Caius, a prætor of Sicily, who, when Cicero was banished, refused to receive the exiled orator, though his friend, for fear of the resentment of Clodius. Cic. ad Q. Frat.

VIRGINIA, a daughter of the centurion L. Virginius. Appius Claudius the decemvir became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where she resided. She was claimed by one of his favourites as the daughter of a slave, and Appius, in the capacity and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the sentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to see his daughter, and when this request was granted, he snatched a knife and plunged it into Virginia's breast, exclaiming, This is all, my dearest daughter, I can give thee, to preserve thy chastity from the lust and violence of a tyrant. No sooner was the blow given than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers were astonished and incensed, not against the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cause of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was seized, but he destroyed himself in prison and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs who had not opposed the tyrant's views, killed himself also, and Marcus Claudius, the favourite of Appius, was put to death, and the decemviral power abolished, about 449 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 44, &c.—Juv. 10, v. 294.

VIRGINIUS, the father of Virginia, made tribune of the people. [vid. Virginia.]—A tribune of the people who accused Q. Cæso, the son of Cincinnatus. He increased the number of the tribunes to ten, and distinguished himself by his seditions against the patricians.—Another tribune in the age of Camillus, fined for his opposition to a law which proposed going to Veii.—Caius, a prætor of Sicily, who opposed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator. Some read Virgilius.—One of the generals of Nero in Germany. He made war against Vindex and conquered him. He was treated with great coldness by Galba, whose interest he had supported with so much success. He refused all dangerous stations, and though twice offered the imperial purple, he rejected it with disdain. Plut.

VIRIATHUS, a mean shepherd of Lusitania, who gradually rose to power, and by first heading a gang of robbers, saw himself at last followed by a numerous army. He made war against the Romans with uncommon success, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himself was ashamed to find himself beaten. Cæpio was at last sent against him. But his despair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourse to artifice, and he had the meanness to bribe the servants of Viriathus to murder their master, B. C. 40. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 52 and 54.

VIRIDOMĀRUS, a young man of great power among the Ædui. Cæsar greatly honoured him, but he fought at last against the Romans. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 39, &c.

VIRIPLĀCA, a goddess among the Romans who presided over the peace of families, whence her name, (virum placare.) If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddess, which was erected on the Palatine mount, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

VIRTUS. All virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue and the other to Honour. They were built in such a manner, that to see the temple of Honour it was necessary to pass through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal virtues were distinguished, each by their attire. Prudence was known by her ruel; and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Justice held an equal balance; and Fortitude leant against her sword; Honesty was clad in a transparent vest; Modesty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive-branch, and Devotion threw incense upon an altar; Tranquillity was seen to lean on a column; Health was known by her serpent; Liberty by her cap, and Gaiety by her myrtle. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 23.—Plaut. in amph. prol.—Liv. 29, c. 11.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 20.

VISURGIS, a river of Germany, now called the Weeser, and falling into the German ocean. Varus and his legions were cut to pieces on its banks by the Germans. [vid. Teutobergensis Saltus, Varus, and Arminius.] Vell. 2, c. 105.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 70, l. 2, c. 9.

VISCELLÆ, now Wetz, a town of Noricum, between the Enns and Mure. Cic. Ann. 11.

VISELLIA LEX, was made by Visellius Varro, the consul, A. U. C. 776, to restrain the introduction of improper persons into the offices of the state.

VISTŪLA, a river falling into the Baltic, the eastern boundary of ancient Germany.

VITELLIUS AULUS, a Roman raised by his vices to the throne. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families of Rome, and as such he gained an easy admission to the palace of the emperors. The greatest part of his youth was spent at Capræ, where his willingness and compliance to gratify the most vicious propensities of Tiberius, raised his father to the dignity of consul and governor of Syria. The applause he gained in this school of debauchery was too great and flattering to induce Vitellius to alter his conduct and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleased with his skill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him because he was a great gamester, and he recommended himself to the favours of Nero by wishing him to sing publicly in the crowded theatre. With such an insinuating disposition, it is not to be wondered that Vitellius became so great. He did not fall with his patrons, like the other favourites, but the death of an emperor seemed to raise him to greater honours, and to procure him fresh applause. He passed through all the offices of the state, and gained the soldiery by donations and liberal promises. He was at the head of the Roman legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no sooner heard in the camp, than he was likewise invested with the purple by his soldiers. He accepted with pleasure the dangerous office, and instantly marched against Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth, however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona, left him master of the field and of the Roman empire. He feasted his eyes in viewing the bodies of the slain and the ground covered with blood, and, regardless of the insalubrity of the air proceeding from so many carcases, he told his attendants that the smell of a dead enemy was always sweet. His first care was not, like that of a true conqueror, to alleviate the distresses of the conquered, or patronize the friends of the dead, but it was to insult their misfortunes, and to intoxicate himself with the companions of his debauchery in the field of battle. Each successive day exhibited a scene of greater extravagance. Vitellius feasted four or five times a day, and such was his excess, that he often made himself vomit to begin his repast afresh, and to gratify his palate with more luxury. His food was of the most rare and exquisite nature; the deserts of Libya, the shores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian Sea, were diligently searched to supply the table of the emperor. The most celebrated of his feasts was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats, was covered with two thousand different dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowls, and so expensive was he in every thing, that above seven millions sterling were spent in maintaining his table in the space of four months; and Josephus has properly observed, that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found insufficient to defray the expenses of his banquets. This extravagance, which delighted the favourites, soon raised the indignation of the people. Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his minister Primus was sent to destroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himself under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obscure retreat betrayed him. He was dragged naked through the streets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn sword was placed under his chin to make him lift his head. After suffering the greatest insults from the populace, he was at last carried to the place of execution, and put to death with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook, and thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 69, after a reign of one year, except 12 days. Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2.—Eutrop.—Dio.—Plut.—Lucius, the father of the emperor, obtained great honours by his flattery to the emperors. He was made governor of Syria, and in this distant province he obliged the Parthians to sue for peace. His adulation to Messalina is well known, he obtained as a particular favour the honourable office of pulling off the shoes of the empress, &c. Suet. &c.—A brother of the emperor, who enjoyed his favour by encouraging his gluttony, &c.—Publius, an uncle of the emperor of that name. He was accused under Nero of attempts to bribe the people, with money from the treasury, against the emperor; he killed himself before his trial.—One of the flatterers of Tiberius.—An officer of the pretorians under Otho.—A son of the emperor Vitellius, put to death by one of his father's friends.—Some of the family of the Vitellii conspired with the Aquilii and other illustrious Romans to restore Tarquin to his throne. Their conspiracy was discovered by the consuls, and they were severely punished. Plut. &c.

M. VITRUVIUS POLLIO, a celebrated architect in the age of Augustus, born at Formiæ. [Some have placed Vitruvius in the age of Titus, but they have been ably refuted by Hirt in his elaborate work on Ancient Architecture.] He is known only by his writings, and nothing is recorded in history of his life or private character. He wrote a treatise on his profession, which he dedicated to Augustus, and it is the only book on architecture now extant written by the ancients. In this work he plainly shows that he was master of his profession, and that he possessed both genius and abilities. [The work is in 10 books. The first seven treat of architecture, in its proper sense, the last three of hydraulic architecture, gnomonics, and mechanics. The style of Vitruvius is unostentatious, concise, and sometimes obscure. Its obscurity, however, is owing to the fact of Vitruvius having been the first Roman who wrote on the subject of architecture, and his using in consequence new terms and forms of expression to convey the meaning which he intends.] The best edition of Vitruvius is that of De Laet, Amst. 1649. [There is a still better edition by Schneider, Lips. 1807, in 3 vols. 8vo. It is to be regretted that the plans which originally accompanied the work of Vitruvius are lost to us.]

VITŪLA, a deity among the Romans who presided over festivals and rejoicings. Macrob. 3, c. 2.

VITULARIA VIA, a road in the country of Arpinum. Cic. Q. fr. 8, ep. 1.

ULPIA TRAJANA, [a city of Dacia, the residence of Decebalus. It was taken by Trajan, and called by this name. It is now Sarmizegethusa, the capital of modern Transylvania.]

[ULPIANUM, a town of upper Mœsia, said by Procopius to have been repaired and embellished by Justinian, and called Justiniana Secunda. It is now Giustendil.]—[One of the principal towns of Dacia, now perhaps Kolsovar.]

ULPIANUS DOMITIUS, [one of those who have conferred the greatest honour on Roman jurisprudence, was born at Tyre. Under Septimius Severus he became the colleague of Sextus Pomponius in the judicial stations which he filled. He continued to discharge these same official duties under Caracalla and Macrinus, but was sent into exile after the death of Heliogabalus. Alexander Severus recalled him, made him one of his council, and treated him with the greatest regard. He appointed him also Prætorian Prefect. In this post he rendered himself odious to the soldiery, who complained that he wished to abridge the privileges which they had enjoyed under Heliogabalus. They frequently demanded his death; and on one occasion, the emperor, to save him, covered him with his purple. Ulpian, however, was at last massacred by them, almost in the very arms of the emperor, to whom he had fled for refuge. The people took up arms to defend him, and a violent contest arose, which lasted during three days. Ulpian wrote the most works of any Roman jurist: we have the titles of more than thirty of his productions, among which was a digest in 48 books: a commentary on the edictum perpetuum in 83, and another on the Lex Julia Papia in 20. Of all these works there remain 29 chapters of that entitled "Regula Juris," and which consisted of 7 books. They were inserted in the abridgment of the Roman law made by order of Alaric. We have also his commentaries in Greek on Demosthenes. The heathen writers have concurred in their eulogy of Ulpian, but the Christians have reproached him for inciting the emperor to a persecution of their sect.] The Greek commentaries of Ulpian on Demosthenes were printed in fol. 1527, apud Aldum.

ULŪBRÆ, a small town of Latium, on the river Astura, where Augustus was educated. Juv. 10, v. 102.—Horat. 1, ep. 11.

ULYSSES, a king of the islands of Ithaca and Dulichium, son of Anticlea and Laertes, or, according to some, of Sisyphus. [vid. Sisyphus and Anticlea.] He became, like the other princes of Greece, one of the suitors of Helen; but as he despaired of success in his applications, on account of the great number of his competitors, he solicited the hand of Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Tyndarus, the father of Helen, favoured the addresses of Ulysses, as by him he was directed to choose one of his daughter's suitors without offending the others, and to bind them all by a solemn oath, that they would unite together in protecting Helen if any violence was ever offered to her person. Ulysses had no sooner obtained the hand of Penelope, than he returned to Ithaca, where his father resigned him the crown, and retired to peace and rural solitude. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in his kingdom; and as he was bound to defend her against every intruder, he was summoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. Pretending to be insane, not to leave his beloved Penelope, he yoked a horse and a bull together, and ploughed the seashore, where he sowed salt instead of corn. This dissimulation was soon discovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulysses his infant son Telemachus, convinced the world that the father was not mad, who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow not to hurt his child. Ulysses was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had discovered his pretended insanity. [vid. Palamedes.] During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his superior prudence and sagacity. By his means Achilles was discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, (vid. Achilles,) and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. (vid. Philoctetes.) He was not less distinguished for his activity and valour. With the assistance of Diomedes he murdered Rhesus, and slaughtered the sleeping Thracians in the midst of their camp, (vid. Rhesus and Dolon,) and he introduced himself into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. (vid. Palladium.) For these eminent services he was universally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had disputed with him. After the Trojan war, Ulysses embarked on board his ships to return to Greece, but he was exposed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coasts of Africa, and visited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was the king of the Cyclops, seized Ulysses with his companions, five of whom he devoured, (vid.

Polyphemus,) but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eye, and at last escaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined by tying himself under the belly of the sheep of the Cyclops when led to pasture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him, confined in bags, all the winds which could obstruct his return to Ithaca; but the curiosity of his companions to know what the bags contained proved nearly fatal. The winds rushed with impetuosity, and all the fleet was destroyed except the ship which carried Ulysses. From thence he was thrown upon the coasts of the Læstrigones, and of the island Æea, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuousness. He escaped their fate by means of an herb which he had received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to restore his companions to their original shape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He visited the infernal regions, and consulted Tiresias how to regain his country in safety: and after he had received every necessary information, he returned on earth. He passed along the coasts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe, (vid. Sirenes,) and escaped the whirlpools and shoals of Scylla and Charybdis. On the coasts of Sicily his companions stole and killed some oxen that were sacred to Apollo, for which the god destroyed the ships, and all were drowned except Ulysses, who saved himself on a plank, and swam to the island of Calypso Ogygia. There, for seven years, he forgot Ithaca in the arms of the goddess, by whom he had two children. The gods at last interfered, and Calypso, by order of Mercury, suffered him to depart after she had furnished him with a ship and every thing requisite for the voyage. He had almost reached the island of Coreyra, when Neptune, still mindful that his son Polyphemus had been robbed of his sight by means of Ulysses, raised a storm and sunk his ship. Ulysses swam with difficulty to the island of the Phæacians, where the kindness of Nausica, and the humanity of her father, king Alcinous, entertained him for a while. He related the series of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at last, by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ship to Ithaca. The Phæacians laid him on the sea-shore as he was asleep, and Ulysses found himself safely restored to his country, after a long absence of 20 years. He was well informed that his palace was besieged by a number of suitors, who continually disturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he assumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himself known to his son, and his faithful shepherd Eumæus. With them he took measures to re-establish himself on his throne, he went to the palace, and was personally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning suitors were put to death, and Ulysses restored to the peace and bosom of his family. [vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus.] He lived about sixteen years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, with the hopes of making himself known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tiresias, who assured him that he should die by the violence of something that was to issue from the bosom of the sea. [vid. Telegonus.] According to some authors, Ulysses went to consult the oracle of Apollo after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanness to seduce Erippe, the daughter of a king of Epirus, who had treated him with great kindness. Erippe had a son by him whom she called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was sent to Ithaca by his mother, but Penelope no sooner knew who he was than she resolved to destroy him. Therefore, when Ulysses returned, he put to immediate death his unknown son, on the crimination of Penelope his wife, who accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulysses in his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war are the subject of Homer's Odyssey. *Homer. Il. & Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, &c.—Dactyls. Cret. 1, &c.—Ovid. UMBRIA, a country of Italy, separated from Etruria by the Tiber, bounded on the north by the Adriatic Sea, east by Picenum, south by the country of the Sabines and the river Nar. Some derive the word Umbria ab imbribus, the frequent showers that were supposed to fall there, or from the shadow (umbra) of the Appenines which hung over it. Umbria had many cities of note. [vid. remarks under the article Italia.] The Umbrians opposed the Romans in the infancy of their empire, but afterwards they became their allies, about the year U. C. 434. Catull. 40, v. 11.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 12.—Dionys. Hal.

UMBRO, a general who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and was killed during the war. He could assuage the fury of serpents by his songs, and counteract the poisonous effects of their bites. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 752, l. 10, v. 544.

UNCA, a surname of Minerva among the Phæacians and Thebans.

UNDECEMVIRI, magistrates at Athens, to whom such as were publicly condemned were delivered to be executed. C. Nep. in Phoc.

UNELLI, a people of Gaul, conquered by Cæsar. [They were situate to the north-west of modern Normandy. Their country was bounded on three sides by the sea. Their chief town was Coriallum, now Gouril.] Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 34.

UNIGENA, a surname of Minerva, as sprung of Jupiter alone.

UNXIA, a surname of Juno, derived from ungere, to anoint, because it was usual among the Romans for the bride to anoint the threshold of her husband; and from this necessary ceremony wives were called Unxores, and afterwards Uxores, from Unxia, who presided over them. Arnob. 3.

VOCŌNIA LEX, de testamentis, by Q. Voconius Saxa, the tribune, A. U. C. 584, enacted, that no woman should be left heiress to an estate, and that no rich person should leave by his will more than the fourth part of his fortune to a woman. This step was taken to prevent the decay of the noblest and most illustrious of the families of Rome. This law was abrogated by Augustus.

[VOCONŪI, a people of Gaul, on the banks of a small stream called Druna or Drome, which falls into the Rhone about 100 miles from the mouth of that river. Their chief town was Dia, now Die. According to some, however, it was Vasco, now Vascon.]

VOGĒSUS, now Vauge, [or Vosges.] a mountain of Belgic Gaul, which separates the Sequani from the Lingones. [It is a branch of the chain of Iura, stretching in a northern direction, and in it are the sources of the Arar, Mosa, and Mosella. VOLCI, an inland town of Lucania, now Lauria. Liv. 27, c. 15.—A town of Etruria. Plin. 3, c. 5.

VOLOGĒSES, a name common to many of the kings of Parthia who made war against the Roman emperors. Tacit. 12, Ann. 14.

VOLSCI, or VOLCI, a people of Latium, whose territories are bounded on the south by the Tyrrhene Sea, north by the country of the Hernici and Marsi, west by the Latini and Rutulians, and east by Campania. Their chief cities were Antium, Circei, Anxur, Corioli, Fregellæ, Arpinum, &c. Ancus, king of Rome, made war against them, and, in the time of the republic, they became formidable enemies, till they were at last conquered with the rest of the Latini. Liv. 3 and 4.—*Virg. VOLSINIUM. [vid. Vulsinii.]

VOLUBILIS, a town of Africa, supposed Fez, the capital of Morocco; Plin. 5, c. 1.

VOLUMNIA FANUM, a temple in Etruria, sacred to the goddess Volumnia, who presided over the will and over complaisance, where the states of the country used to assemble. Viterbo now stands on the spot. Liv. 4, c. 23, l. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 2.

VOLUMNIA, the wife of Coriolanus. Liv. 2, c. 40.

VOLUMNUS and VOLUMNA, two deities who presided over the will. They were chiefly invoked at marriages, to preserve concord between the husband and wife. They were particularly worshipped by the Etrurians. Liv. 4, c. 61.

T. VOLUMNIUS, a Roman famous for his friendship towards M. Lucullus, whom M. Antony had put to death. His great lamentations were the cause that he was dragged to the triumvir, of whom he demanded to be conducted to the body of his friend, and there to be put to death. His request was easily granted. Liv. 124, c. 20.—A consul who defeated the Samnites and the Etrurians, &c. Liv. 9.—A friend of M. Brutus. He was preserved when that great republican killed himself, and he wrote an account of his death and of his actions, from which Plutarch selected some remarks.

VOLUPTAS and VOLUPIA, the goddess of sensual pleasures, worshipped at Rome, where she had a temple. She is represented as a young and beautiful woman, well dressed, and elegantly adorned, seated on a throne, and having virtue under her feet. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 23.—Macrob. 1, c. 10.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 8.

VOLUSIĀNUS, a Roman taken as colleague on the imperial throne by his father Gallus. He was killed by his soldiers.

VŌLŪSIUS, a poet of Patavia, who wrote like Ennius, the annals of Rome in verse. Seneca, ep. 93.—Catull. 96, v. 7.—Saturninus, a governor of Rome, who died in the 93d year of his age, beloved and respected, under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 13.

VŌLUX, a son of Bocchus, whom the Romans defeated. Sylla suspected his fidelity, &c. Sallust. Jug. 105.

VONŌNES, a king of Parthia expelled by his subjects, and afterwards placed on the throne of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 14.

VOPISCU, a native of Syracuse, 303 A. D. who wrote the life of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Carus, &c. He is one of the six authors who are called Historia Augustæ scriptores, but he excels all others in the elegance of his style, and the manner in which he relates the various actions of the emperors. He is not, however, without his faults, and we look in vain for the purity or perspicuity of the writers of the Augustan age.

VOTIĒNUS MONTANUS, a man of learning banished to one of the Baleares for his malevolent reflections upon Tiberius. Ovid has celebrated him as an excellent poet. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.

UPIS, the father of one of the Dianas mentioned by the ancients, from which circumstance Diana herself is called Upis. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Callim. in Dian.

URĀNIA, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over astronomy. She is generally called mother of Linus by Apollo, and of the god Hymenæus by Bacchus. She was represented as a young virgin dressed in an azure-coloured robe, crowned with stars, and holding a globe in her hands, and having many mathematical instruments placed round. Hesiod. Theog. 77.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 161.—A surname of Venus, the same as Celestial. She was supposed, in that character, to preside over beauty and generation, and was called daughter of Uranus or Cælus by the Light. Her temples in Asia, Africa, Greece, and Italy were numerous. Plato in Symp.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Paus. 1, c. 14, &c. l. 7, c. 26, &c.

URANOPŌLIS, a town [on Mount Athos, near the southern side. It was founded, according to Athenæus, by Alexarchus the brother of Cassander.]

URĀNUS, or OURANUS, [vid. remarks under the article Jupiter,] a deity, the same as Cælus, the most ancient of all the gods. He married Tithea, or the Earth, by whom he had Ceus, Creus, Hyperion, Mnemosyne, Cottus, Phœbe, Briareus, Thetis, Saturn. Giges, called from their mother Titans. His children conspired against him, because he confined them in the bosom of the earth, and his son Saturn mutilated him, and drove him from his throne.

URBA, now Orbe, a town of the Helvetii, on a river of the same name.

URBINUM, now Urbino, a town of Umbria. Plin. 3, c. 14.

[URCIUM], a town on the western coast of Corsica. It is said to have been founded by Eurysaces the son of Ajax, and is now Ajaccio.]

URGO, now Gorgona, an island in the bay of Pisa, 25 miles west of Leghorn, famous for anchovies. Plin. 3, c. 6.

URSENTUM, a town of the Brutii, now Orso. Plin. 3, c. 11.

USIPĒTES, or USIPII, a people of Germany [on the right bank of the Rhine.] Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 1, &c.

USTICA, a town in an island on the coast of Sicily, near Panormum.—[A mountain among the Sabines.] Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 11.

UTENS, a river of Gaul, now Montone, falling into the Adriatic by Ravenna. Liv. 5, c. 35.

UTICA, now Satcor, a celebrated city of Africa [Propria,] on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the same bay as Carthage, founded by a Tyrian colony above 287 years before Carthage, [from which city it was only 7 miles distant.] It had a large and commodious harbour, and it became the metropolis of Africa after the destruction of Carthage in the 3d Punic war, and the Romans granted it all the lands situate between Hippo and Carthage. It is celebrated for the death of Cato, who from thence is called Uticensis, or of Utica. Strab. 17.—Lucan. 6, v. 306.—Justin. 18, c. 4.—Plin. 16, c. 40.—Liv. 25, c. 31.—Sil. 3, v. 242.—Horat. 1, ep. 20, v. 513.

VULCANĀLIA, festivals in honour of Vulcan, brought to Rome from Præneste, and observed in the month of August. The streets were illuminated, fires kindled every where, and animals thrown into the flames as a sacrifice to the deity. Varro de L. L. 5.—Dion. Hal. 1.—Columell. 11.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

VULCĀNI INSULÆ, or VULCANIÆ, a name given to the islands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. [vid. Lipara.] Virg. Æn. 8, v. 422. They received it because there were there subterraneous fires, supposed to be excited by Vulcan, the god of fire. [All volcanic situations were believed to be occupied by the forges of this deity.]

VULCANIUS, Terentianus, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the lives of the three Gordians, &c.

VULCĀNUS, a god of the ancients who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metals. [vid. remarks under the article Jupiter, and also remarks at the end of the present article.] He was son of Juno alone, who in this wished to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer, he was son of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was so disgusted with the deformities of her son, that she threw him into the sea as soon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinions, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the rest of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother who had been fastened by a golden chain for her insolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the island of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants, seeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He, however, broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his residence in Lemnos, where he built himself a palace, and raised forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the island became sensible of his industry, and were taught all the useful arts which could civilize their rude manners, and render them serviceable to the good of society. The first work of Vulcan was, according to some, a throne of gold with secret springs, which he presented to his mother to avenge himself for her want of affection towards him. Juno no sooner was seated on the throne than she found herself unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpose, and Vulcan alone had the power to set her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him, and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the ancient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made, and many speak of two golden statues, which not only seemed animated, but which walked by his side, and even assisted him in the working of metals. It is said, that at the request of Jupiter he made the first woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. [vid. Pandora.] The Cyclops of Sicily were his ministers and attendants, and with him they fabricated, not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under Mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were volcanoes. The most known of the works of Vulcan which were presented to mortals, are the arms of Achilles, those of Æneas, the shield of Hercules described by Hesiod, a collar given to Hermione the wife of Cadmus, and a sceptre, which was in the possession of Agamemnon, king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar proved fatal to all those that wore it, but the sceptre, after the death of Agamemnon, was carefully preserved at Cheronæa and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promised him in marriage whatever goddess he should choose, and when she refused his addresses, he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva resisted with success, though there remained on her body some marks of Vulcan's passion, which she threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. [vid. Erichthonius.] This disappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter, who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is universally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were discovered by Phœbus, and exposed to the gods by her own husband. [vid. Alectryon.] The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens, and at Rome. It was usual in the sacrifices that were offered to him to burn the whole victim, and not reserve part of it as in the immolations to the rest of the gods. A calf and a boar-pig were the principal victims offered. Vulcan was represented as covered with sweat, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges. His breast was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with smoke. Some represent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raised in the air, ready to strike; while with the other hand he turns, with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil, for which an eagle waits by his side to carry it to Jupiter. He appears on some monuments with a long beard, dishevelled hair, half naked, and a small round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians represented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphanus, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cylopedes, Chalaipoda, &c. all expressive of his lameness and his profession. He was father of Cupid, by Venus; of Cæculus, Cærops, Cæcus, Periphætes, Cercyon, Ocrisia, &c. Cicero speaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls son of Cælus, and father of Apollo by Minerva; the second he mentions is son of the Nile, and called Phta by the Egyptians; the third was the son of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his residence in Lemnos; and the fourth, who built his forges in the Lipari islands, was son of Mênalius. [Banier mentions another Vulcan more ancient than either of these, namely the Tubal Cain of Scripture, who, having applied himself to the forging of metals, as Moses informs us, became the model and original of all the rest. According to some, Vulcan is the same with fire, and Varro makes the name to be derived from the force and violence of that element. (Vulcanus, quasi Volcanus, quod ignis per aerem volitet; vel a vi ac violentiâ ignis), and therefore he is painted with a blue hat, a symbol of the celestial or elementary fire, which is by nature pure and unmixed; whereas the common fire that is on earth is weak, and wants fuel to support it, and therefore Vulcan is said to be lame. He is said also to have been cast down from heaven into Lemnos from that island having been of volcanic origin.] Hesiod. Theog. & in Scut. Herc. 140 and 320.—Apollod. 1, c. 3. &c.—*Homer. VULCATIUS, a Roman knight who conspired with Piso against Nero, &c. Tacit.—A senator in the reign of Dioclesian, who attempted to write an history of all such as had reigned at Rome, either as lawful sovereigns or by usurpation. Of his works nothing is extant but an account of Avidius Cassius, who revolted in the east during the reign of M Aurelius, which work some ascribe to Spartianus.

VULTURNUM, a town of Campania, near the mouth of the Volturnus. [vid. Vultur-nus.] Liv. 25, c. 20.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Also an ancient name of Capua. Liv. 4, c. 37. •

VULTURNUS, a river of Campania rising in the Appenines, [in the territory of the Hirpini,] and falling into the Tyrrhene Sea after passing by the town of Capua. [In the second Punic war a fort was erected at the mouth of this river, which afterwards became a town, in which was established a Roman colony. The name of this town was Vultur-num. The modern name of the river is Vulturno.] Lucret. 5, 664.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 729.—The god of Tiber was also known by that name. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 5.—The wind which received the name of Vultur-nus when it blew from the side of the Vultur-nus, highly incommoded the Romans at the battle of Cannæ. [It corresponds to the south-east.] Liv. 22, c. 43 and 46.—A surname of Apollo on Mount Lissus in Ionia, near Ephesus. The god received this name from a shepherd who raised him a temple after he had been drawn out of a subterraneous cavern by vultures.

VULSINUM, a town of Etruria, where Senjanus was born. [It was situate on the north-eastern extremity of the Lacus Vulsiniensis, and is now Bolsena.]

UXANTIS, now Usant, an island on the coast of Britany.

UXELLODUNUM, a town of Gaul defended by steep rocks, now Puech d'Issolu. Cæs. B. G. 8, c. 33.

UKENTUM, a town of Calabria, now Ugento.

UXII, mountains of Armenia, with a nation of the same name, conquered by Alexander. The Tigris rises in their country. Strab. —Diog.

XA

XANTHI, a people of Thrace.—The inhabitants of Xanthus in Asia. (vid. Xanthus.)

XANTHICA, a festival observed by the Macedonians in the month called Xanthicus, the same as April. It was then usual to make a lustration of the army with great solemnity. A bitch was cut into two parts, and one half of the body placed on one side and the other part on the other side, after which the soldiers marched between, and they imitated a real battle by a sham engagement.

XANTHUS, or XANTHOS, a river of Troas, in Asia Minor. It is the same as the Scamander, but, according to Homer, it was called Xanthus by the gods and Scamander by men. (vid. Scamander.)—A river of Lycia, anciently called Sirbes. It was sacred to Apollo, and fell into the sea near Patara. Homer. Il. 6, v. 172.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—A Greek historian of Lydia, who wrote an account of his country, of which some fragments remain. Dionys. Hal.—A king of Bœotia, who made war against the Athenians. He was killed by the artifice of Melanthus. (vid. Apaturia.)—A philosopher of Samus, in whose house Æsop lived some time as servant.—A town of Lycia, on the river of the same name, at the distance of about 15 miles from the sea-shore. The inhabitants are celebrated for their love of liberty and national independence. Brutus laid siege to their city, and when at last they were unable longer to support themselves against the enemy, they set fire to their houses and destroyed themselves. The conqueror wished to spare them; but though he offered rewards to his soldiers if they brought any of the Xanthians alive into his presence, only 150 were saved, much against their will. Appian. 4.—Plut. in Brut.

XANTIPPE, the wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peevish disposition, which are become proverbial. Some suppose that the philosopher was acquainted with her moroseness and insolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himself to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinence, and one day, not satisfied with using the most bitter invectives, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head, upon which the philosopher coolly observed, after thunder there generally falls rain. ["It is very probable," observes Enfield, "that the infirmities of this good woman have been exaggerated, and that calumny has had some hand in finishing her picture; for Socrates himself, in a dialogue with his son Lamprocles, allows her many domestic virtues, and we find her afterwards expressing great affection for her husband during his imprisonment. She must have been as deficient in understanding as she was froward in disposition, if she had not profited by the daily lessons, which for twenty years she received from such a master."] Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 10, l. 9, c. 7, l. 11, c. 12.—Diog. in Socrat.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general who assisted the Carthaginians in the first Punic war. He defeated the Romans, 256 B. C. and took the celebrated Regulus prisoner. Such signal services deserved to be rewarded; but the Carthaginians looked with envious jealousy upon Xantippus, and he retired to Corinth after he had saved them from destruction. Some authors support that the Carthaginians ordered him to be assassinated, and his body to be thrown into the sea, as he was returning home; while others say that they had prepared a leaky ship to convey him to Corinth, which he artfully avoided. Liv. 18 and 28, c. 43.—Appian. de Pun.

An Athenian general who fought against the Persians at Mycale with Leotyichides. A statue was erected to his honour in the citadel of Athens. He made some conquests in Thrace, and increased the power of Athens. He was father to the celebrated Pericles by Agariste the niece of Clisthenes, who expelled the Pisistratidæ from Athens. Paus. 3, c. 7, l. 3, c. 52.—A son of Pericles who disgraced his father by his disobedience, his ingratitude, and his extravagance. He died of the plague in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.

XENARCHUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Seleucia, who taught at Alexandria and at Rome, and was intimate with Augustus. Strab. 1.—A prætor of the Achæan league who wished to favour the interest of Perseus, king of Macedonia, against the Romans.

XENIADÆS, a Corinthian who went to buy Diogenes the Cynic when sold as a slave. He asked him what he could do? upon which the Cynic answered, command freemen. This noble answer so pleased XeniadæS, that he gave the Cynic his liberty, and intrusted him with the care and education of his children. Diog.—Gell. 2, c. 18.

XENIUS, a surname given to Jupiter as the god of hospitality.

XENOCLEA, a priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi, from whom Hercules extorted an oracle by force when she refused to answer him because he was not purified of the blood and death of Iphitus. Paus. 10, c. 13.

XENOCLES, a tragic writer, who obtained four times a poetical prize, in a contention in which Euripides was competitor, either through the ignorance or by the bribery of his judges. The names of his tragedies which obtained the victory were Cædipus, Lycaon, Bacchæ, Athamas Satyricus, against the Alexander, Palamedes, Trojani, and Sisyphus Satyricus, of Euripides. His grandson bore also the name of Xenocles, and excelled in tragical compositions. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8.—A celebrated rhetorician of Adramyttium. Strab. 13.

XENOCRATES, an ancient philosopher, born at Chalcedon and educated in the school of Plato, whose friendship he gained, and whose approbation he merited. Though of a dull and sluggish disposition, he supplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and industry, and was at last found capable of succeeding in the school of Plato after Speusippus, about 339 years before Christ. He was remarkable as a disciplinarian, and he required that his pupils should be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected some who had not the necessary qualification, saying that they had not yet found the key of philosophy. He did not only recommend himself to his pupils by precepts, but more powerfully by example; and since the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors, (vid. Polemon.) his company was as much shunned by the dissolute and extravagant, as it was courted by the virtuous and the benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father, and sent some of his friends with 50 talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small, frugal, and elegant, without ostentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the 50 talents, but the philosopher asked them whether they had perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day, that he was not in want of money: Tell your master, said he, to keep his money, he has more people to maintain than I have. Yet not to offend the monarch, he accepted a small sum, about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not less conspicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an instance of virtue from the following circumstance. The courtesan Lais had pledged herself to forfeit an immense sum of money if she did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, assumed the most captivating looks, and used the most tempting attitudes to gain the philosopher, but in vain; and she declared at last that she had not lost her money, as she had pledged herself to conquer an human being, not a lifeless stone. Though so respected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to prison because he was unable to pay a small tribute to the state. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was so well known that when he appeared in the court as a witness, the judges dispensed with his oath. He died B. C. 314, in his 82d year, after he had presided in the academy for above 25 years. It is said that he fell in the night with his head into a basin of water, and that he was suffocated. He had written above 60 treatises on different subjects, all now lost. He acknowledged no other deity but heaven, and the seven planets, [or rather, he taught that the heavens are divine and the stars celestial gods; and that besides these divinities there are terrestrial demons of a middle nature between the gods and man.] Diog.—Cic. ad Attic. 10, ep. 1, &c.—Tusc. 5, c. 32.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Lucian.—A physician in the age of Nero, not in great esteem. His Greek treatise, de alimento ex aquatilibus, is best edited by Franzius, Lips. 8vo. 1774.—An excellent painter. Plin. 34, c. 8.

XENOPHĀNES, a Greek philosopher of Colophon, disciple of Archelaus, B. C. 535. He wrote several poems and treatises, and founded a sect, which was called the Eleatic in Sicily. Wild in his opinions about astronomy, he supposed that the stars were extinguished every morning and rekindled at night; that eclipses were occasioned by the temporary extinction of the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and 18 times bigger than the earth; and that there were several suns and moons for the convenience of the different climates of the earth. He further imagined that God and the world were the same, and he credited the eternity of the universe; but his incoherent opinion about the divinity raised the indignation of his countrymen, and he was banished. He died very poor when about 100 years old. Cic. quæst. 4, c. 37, de Div. 1, c. 3, de Nat. D. 1, c. 11.—Laclant. Div. Inst. 3, c. 23.

XENOPHĪLUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, who lived to his 170th year, and enjoyed all his faculties to the last. He wrote upon music, and thence he was called the musician. Lucian. de Macrob.—Plin. 7, c. 50.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.

XENOPHON, an Athenian, son of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an historian, and a philosopher. In the school of Socrates he received those instructions and precepts which afterwards so eminently distinguished him at the head of an army, in literary solitude, and as the prudent father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends, to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, king of Persia; but he refused to comply without previously consulting his venerable master, and inquiring into the propriety of such a measure. Socrates strongly opposed it, and observed that it might raise the resentment of his countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Persian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded farther, he advised him to consult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a distant expedition, he hastened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon showed that he was a true disciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the decisive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of Cyrus, the prudence and vigour of his mind were called into action. The ten thousand Greeks who had followed the standard of an ambitious prince were now at the distance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money, without provisions, and without a leader. Xenophon was selected from among the officers to superintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often opposed by malevolence and envy, yet his persuasive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks that no general could extricate them from every difficulty better than the disciple of Socrates. He rose superior to danger, and though under continual alarms from the sudden attacks of the Persians, he was enabled to cross rapid rivers, penetrate through vast deserts, gain the tops of mountains, till he could rest secure for a while, and refresh his tired companions. This celebrated retreat was at last happily effected, the Greeks returned home after a march of 1155 parasangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an absence of 15 months. [The army of Cyrus marched from Sardis, through Lydia, Phrygia, Lycaonia, and Cappadocia, crossed the mountains of Cilicia, passed through Cilicia and Syria to the Euphrates, forded this river, passed through a part of Arabia and Babylonia, until they reached the plain of Cunaxa. In retreating the object of the Greeks was to strike the Euxine, but the error they committed was in making that sea extend too far to the east. From Cunaxa they turned their course to the Tigris, crossed that river, marched through Media, northwards, still following the course of the Tigris. They then crossed the mountains of the Carduchi, and, after great exertions, reached the sources of the river just mentioned. After this they traversed Armenia, crossed the Euphrates not far from its source, lost many of their number in the marshes through the cold and snow, and at last reached the Phasis. Leaving this stream they passed through the countries Trochi, Chalybes, Macrones, Colchians, and at last reached the Greek colony of Trapezus on the coast of the Euxine Sea. As there were not ships enough there to receive them all, they determined to return home by land, and marching along the coast of the Euxine, came at last to Chalcedon.] The whole perhaps might now be forgotten, or at least but obscurely known, if the great philosopher who planned it, had not employed his pen in describing the dangers which he escaped, and the difficulties which he surmounted. He was no sooner returned from Cunaxa, than he sought new honours in following the fortune of Agesilaus in Asia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his standard, and conquered with him in the Asiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronæa. His fame, however, did not escape the aspersions of jealousy; he was publicly banished from Athens for accompanying Cyrus against his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a small town of the Elis, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In this solitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary pursuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Asiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art, for his pleasure and enjoyment, the country which surrounded Scillus. He built a small temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Ephesus, and spent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were soon disturbed. A war arose between the Lacedæmonians and Elis; the sanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philosopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were disregarded, and Xenophon, driven by the Elians from his favourite spot, where he had composed and written for the information of posterity and honour of his country, retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died, in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the Christian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous. He wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabasis, and as he had no inconsiderable share in the enterprize, his descriptions must be authentic, as he was himself an eye-witness. Many, however, have accused him of partiality. He appeared often too fond of extolling the virtues of his favourite Cyrus, and while he describes with contempt the imprudent operations of the Persians, he does not neglect to show that he was a native of Greece. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given rise to much criticism, and while some warmly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is supported by the authority of Scripture, others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and these venerable philosophers support, that the historian did not so much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true good and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hellenica were written as a continuation of the history of Thucydides; and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his Apology, he has shown himself, as Valerius Maximus observes, a perfect master of the philosophy of that great man, and he has explained his doctrines and moral precepts with all the success of persuasive eloquence and conscious integrity. These are the most famous of his compositions, besides which there are other small tracts, his eulogium given on Agesilaus, his economics on the duties of domestic life, the dialogue entitled Hiero, in which he happily describes and compares the mis-

ry which attended the tyrant, with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatise on hunting, the symposium of the philosophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatise on the revenues of Attica, &c. The simplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of the Athenian muse and the bee of Greece, and they have induced Quintilian to say, that the Graces dictated his language, and that the goddess of persuasion dwelt upon his lips. His sentiments, as to the divinity and religion, were the same as those of the venerable Socrates; he supported the immortality of the soul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate those virtues which ensure the happiness of mankind, with all the zeal and fervour of a Christian. He has been quoted as an instance of tenderness and of resignation to Providence. As he was offering a sacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus, his eldest son, had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head, but when he was told that his son had died like a Greek, and had given a mortal wound to Epaminondas, the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the sacrifice, exclaiming that the pleasure he derived from the valour of his son was greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occasioned. The best editions of Xenophon are those of Leunclavius, fol. Francof. 1596, of Ernesti, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips, 1763, and the Glasgow edition, 12mo. of the Cyropædia, 1767, the expedition of Cyrus 1764, the Memorabilia 1761, and the history of Greece 1762, and likewise the edition of Zeunius, published at Leipsic in 8vo. in 6 vols. between the years 1778 and 1791. [The best editions now, are that of Weiske, Lips. 1798, 6 vols. 8vo. and that of Schneider, of which there is a beautiful reprint from the Clarendon press, in 6 vols. 8vo. 1812-17.] —Cic. in Orat. 19.—*Val. He enjoyed the emperor's favours, and through him the people of Cos were exempt from all taxes. He had the meanness to poison his benefactor at the instigation of Agrippina. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 61 and 67.

XEOLEIYA, a part of Africa between Egypt and Cyrene.

XERXES 1st, succeeded his father Darius on the throne of Persia, and though but the second son of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother Artabazanes. The causes alleged for this preference were that Artabazanes was son of Darius when a private man, and that Xerxes was born after his father had been raised on the Persian throne from Atossa the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extensive possessions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army, which, together with the numerous retinue of servants, eunuchs, and women, that attended it, amounted to no less than 5,283,220 souls. This multitude, which the fidelity of historians has not exaggerated, was stopped at Thermopylæ, by the valour of 300 Spartans under king Leonidas. [A statement of the Grecian forces at Thermopylæ prior to the battle will be found under the article Thermopylæ.] Xerxes, astonished that such a handful of men should dare to oppose his progress, ordered some of his soldiers to bring them alive into his presence, but for three successive days the most valiant of the Persian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and suddenly fallen upon the rear of the devoted Leonidas. The king himself nearly perished on this occasion, and it has been reported, that in the night, the desperate Spartans sought, for a while, the royal tent, which they found deserted, and wandered through the Persian army, slaughtering thousands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the disgrace of Xerxes, the more he advanced, it was to experience new disappointments; his fleet was defeated at Artemisium and Salamis, and though he burnt the deserted city of Athens, and trusted to the artful insinuations of Themistocles, yet he found his millions unable to conquer a nation that was superior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill success of his expedition, and apprehensive of imminent danger in an enemy's country, Xerxes hastened to Persia, and in 30 days he marched over all that territory which before he had passed with so much pomp and parade in the space of six months. Mardonius, the best of his generals, was left behind, with an army of 300,000 men, and the rest that had survived the ravages of war, of famine, and pestilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace, where his steps were marked by the numerous birds of prey that hovered round him, and fed upon the dead carcasses of the Persians. When he reached the Hellespont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there, totally destroyed by the storms, and he crossed the straits in a small fishing vessel. Restored to his kingdom and safety, he forgot his dangers, his losses, and his defeats, and gave himself up to riot and debauchery. His indolence and luxurious voluptuousness offended his subjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conspired against him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 21st year of his reign, about 464 years before the Christian era. The personal accomplishments of Xerxes have been commended by ancient authors, and Herodotus observes that there was not one man among the millions of his army that was equal to the monarch in comeliness or stature, or that was as worthy to preside over a great and extensive empire. The picture is finished, and the character of Xerxes completely known, when we hear Justin exclaim, that the vast armament that invaded Greece was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an instance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a stately throne in the plains of Asia, he suddenly shed a torrent of tears on the recollection that the multitude of men he saw before his eyes, in one hundred years should be no more. His pride and insolence have been deservedly censured, he ordered chains to be thrown into the sea, and the waves to be whipped because the first bridge he had laid across the Hellespont had been destroyed by a storm. He cut a channel through Mount Athos, and saw his fleet sail in a place which before was dry ground. ZABATUS, a river of Assyria falling into the Tigris, near which the ten thousand Greeks stopped in their return. [It is called Zabatus by Xenophon, but otherwise Zabrus or Zerbis, and traverses a large portion of Assyria. It was called Lycus (Λυκος), or "the wolf," by the Greeks; but it has resumed its primitive denomination of Zab, or, according to some modern travellers, Zarb. Farther down, another river, named Zabrus Minor, and called by the Macedonians Caprus, (Καργος), or "the boar," is also received by the Tigris, and is now called by the Turks Allonson, or "the river of gold."] Xenophon.

ZACYNTHUS, a native of Bœotia who accompanied Hercules when he went into Spain to destroy Geryon. At the end of the expedition he was intrusted with the care of Geryon's flocks by the hero, and ordered to conduct them to Thebes. As he went on his journey, he was bit by a serpent, and some time after died. His companions carried his body away, and buried it in an island of the Ionian Sea, which from that time was called Zacynthus. The island of Zacynthus, now called Zante, is situate at the south of Cephalonia, and at the west of the Peloponnesus. ZALEUCUS, a lawgiver of the Locrians in Italy, and one of the disciples of Pythagoras, 550 B. C. He was very humane, and at the same time very austere, and he attempted to enforce his laws more by inspiring shame than dread. He had wisely decreed that a person guilty of adultery should lose both his eyes. His philosophy was called to a trial when he was informed that his son was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed; the people interfered, but Zaleucus resisted, and rather than violate his own institutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of those of his son, to be put out. This made such an impression upon the people, that while Zaleucus presided over the Locrians, no person was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. He began to civilize his countrymen, and the more easily to gain reputation, he concealed himself for three years in a subterraneous cave, and afterwards made them believe that he was just raised from the dead. [Herodotus, who relates this fabulous story as a common tradition, gives it no credit, but expressly says, that so far from being a Pythagorean, he flourished at a much earlier period than Pythagoras. The general testimony of the ancients furnishes reasons for concluding that Zamolxis was a Thracian, who, at a very remote period, taught the Scythians the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and that after his death they paid him divine honours. Herodotus relates that at certain festivals they chose several persons by lot who were to be sent as messengers to Zamolxis; and that they put them to death by throwing them up into the air, and catching them as they fell, upon the points of their spears.] After death he received divine honours. Diod.—Herodot. 4, c. 19, &c.

ZANCLE, a town of Sicily, or the straits which separate that island from Italy. It received its name from its harbour appearing like a scythe, which was called ζαγκλα in the language of the country, or, as others say, because the scythe with which Saturn mutilated his father fell there, or because, as Diodorus reports, a person named Zanclus had either built it or exercised its sovereignty. Zancle fell into the hands of the Samians, 497 years before the Christian era, and three years after it was recovered by Anaxilaus, the Messenian tyrant of Rhegium, who gave it the name of his native country, and called it Messana. [vid. Messana and Mamertini.] It was founded, as most chronologists support, about 1058 years before the Christian era, by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, and peopled by Samians, Ionians, and Chalcidians. Strab. 6, —Diod. 4.—Ital. 1, v. 662.—*Ovid. ZENO, a philosopher of Elia or Velia in Italy, the disciple, or, according to some, the adopted son of Parmenides, and the supposed inventor of dialectic. His opinions about the universe, the unity, incomprehensibility, and immutability of all things, were the same with those of Xenophanes and the rest of the Eleatic philosophers. It is said that he attempted to deliver his country from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was discovered, and he was exposed to the most excruciating torments to reveal the names of his accomplices, but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude; and, not to be at last conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth, and spit it into the face of the tyrant. Some say that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midst of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal something of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whisper to him, caught his ear with his teeth, and bit it off. Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 22, de Nat. D. 3, c. 33.—Diog. in Frag.—Val. Max. 3, c. 3.—Diog. 9.—[The founder of the sect of the Stoics, born at Citium, in the island of Cyprus. His father was by profession a merchant, but, discovering in his son a strong propensity towards learning, he early devoted him to the study of philosophy. In his mercantile capacity, the former had frequent occasion to visit Athens, where he purchased for the young Zeno several of the writings of the most eminent Socratic philosophers. These he read with great avidity; and when he was about thirty years of age, he determined to take a voyage to a city which was so celebrated both as a mart of trade and of science. Whether this voyage was in part mercantile, or wholly undertaken for the sake of conversing with those philosophers whose writings Zeno had long admired, is uncertain. If it be true, as some writers relate, that he brought with him a valuable cargo of Phœnician purple, which was lost by shipwreck upon the coast of Attica, this circumstance will account for the facility with which he at first attached himself to a sect, whose leading principle was contempt of riches. Upon his first arrival in Athens, going accidentally into the shop of a bookseller, he took up a volume of the commentaries of Xenophon, and after reading a few passages, was so much delighted with the work, and formed so high an idea of its author, that he asked the bookseller where he might meet with such men? Crates, the Cynic philosopher, happening at that instant to be passing by, the bookseller pointed to him, and said, "Follow that man." Zeno soon found an opportunity of attending upon the instructions of Crates, and was so well pleased with his doctrine that he became one of his disciples. But though he highly admired the general principles and spirit of the Cynic school, he could not easily reconcile himself to their peculiar manners. Besides, his inquisitive turn of mind would not allow him to adopt that indifference to every scientific enquiry which was one of the characteristic distinctions of the sect. He therefore attended upon other masters, who professed to instruct their disciples in the nature and causes of things. When Crates, displeas'd at his following other philosophers, attempted to drag him by force out of the school of Stilpo, Zeno said to him, "you may seize my body, but Stilpo has laid hold of my mind." After continuing to attend upon the lectures of Zeno for several years, he passed over to other schools, particularly those of Xenocrates, and Diodorus Chronus. By the latter he was instructed in Dialectics. At last, after attending almost every other master, he offered himself as a disciple of Polemo. This philosopher appears to have been aware that Zeno's intention in thus removing from one school to another, was to collect materials, from various quarters, for a new system of his own; for, when he came into Polemo's school, the latter said to him, "I am no stranger to your Phœnician arts, Zeno; I perceive that your design is to creep slyly into my garden, and steal away my fruit." Polemo was not mistaken in his opinion. Having made himself master of the tenets of others, Zeno determined to become the founder of a new sect. The place which he made choice of for his school was called the Pœcile (Ποικίλη Στοά), or "Painted Porch," a public portico, so called from the pictures of Polygnotus, and other eminent masters, with which it was adorned. This portico, being the most famous in Athens, was called by way of distinction Στοά, "the Porch." It was from this circumstance that the followers of Zeno were called Stoics, i. e. the men of the porch. Zeno excelled in that kind of subtle reasoning which was then popular. At the same time he taught a strict system of moral doctrine, and exhibited a pleasing picture of moral discipline in his own life. The Stoic sect in fact was a branch of the Cynic, and, as far as respected morals, differed from it more in words than in reality. Its founder, while he avoided the singularities of the Cynics, retained the spirit of their moral doctrine: at the same time, from a diligent comparison of the tenets of other masters, he framed a new system of speculative philosophy. It is not at all surprising, therefore, that he obtained the applause and affection of numerous followers, and even enjoyed the favour of the great. Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedon, whilst he was resident at Athens, attended his lectures, and upon his return earnestly invited him to his court. He possessed so large a share of esteem among the Athenians, that, on account of his approved integrity, they deposited the keys of their citadel in his hands. They also honoured him with a golden crown, and a statue of brass. Among his countrymen, the inhabitants of Cyprus, and with the Sidonians, from whom his family was derived, he was likewise highly esteemed. In his person, Zeno was tall and slender; his aspect was severe, and his brow contracted. His constitution was feeble; but he preserved his health by great abstemiousness. The supplies of his table consisted of figs, bread, and honey; notwithstanding which, he was frequently honoured with the company of great men. He paid more attention to neatness and decorum in his personal appearance than the Cynic philosophers. In his dress, indeed, he was plain, and his expenses frugal; but this is not to be imputed to avarice, but to a contempt of external magnificence. He showed as much respect to the poor as to the rich; and conversed freely with persons of the meanest occupations. He had only one servant, or, according to Seneca, none. Although Zeno's sobriety and continence were even proverbial, he was not without enemies. Among his contemporaries, several philosophers of great ability and eloquence employed their talents against him. Arcesius and Carneades, the founders of the Middle Academy, were his professed opponents. Towards the close of his life he found another powerful antagonist in Epicurus, whose temper and doctrines were alike inimical to the severe gravity and philosophical pride of the Stoic sect. Hence mutual invectives passed between the Stoics and other sects, to which little credit is due. (vid. remarks under the article Epicurus). Zeno lived to the extreme age of ninety-eight, and at last, in consequence of an accident, put an end to his life. As he was walking out of his school he fell down, and in the fall broke one of his fingers. He was so affected, upon this, with a consciousness of infirmity, that, striking the earth, he exclaimed, Ερχομαι, τι μ' αυεις; "I am coming, why callest thou me?" and immediately went home and strangled himself. He died B. C. 264. The Athenians, at the request of Antigonus, erected a monument to his memory in the Ceramicus. From the particulars that have been related concerning Zeno, it will not be difficult to perceive what kind of influence his circumstances and character must have had upon his philosophical system. If his doctrines be diligently compared with the history of his life, it will appear, that having attended upon many eminent preceptors, and been intimately conversant with their opinions, he compiled out of their various tenets, an heterogeneous system, on the credit of which he assumed to himself the title of the founder of a new sect. When he resolved, for the sake of establishing a new school, to desert the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato, in which he had been perfectly instructed by Xenocrates and Polemo, it became necessary, either to invent opinions entirely new, or to give an air of novelty to old systems by the introduction of new terms and definitions. Of these two undertakings, Zeno prudently made choice of the easier. Cicero says, concerning him, that he had little reason for deserting his masters, especially those of the Platonic school, and that he was not so much an inventor of new opinions as of new terms. That this was the real character of the Porch will fully appear from an attentive perusal of the clear and accurate comparison which Cicero has drawn between the doctrines of the Old Academy and those of the Stoics, in his Academic Questions. As to the moral doctrine of the Cynic sect, to which Zeno adhered to the last, there can be no doubt that he transferred it almost without alloy into his own school. In morals, the principal difference between the Cynics and the Stoics was, that the former disdained the cultivation of nature, the latter affected to rise above it. On the subject of Physics, Zeno received his doctrine from Pythagoras and Heraclitus, through the channel of the Platonic school, as will fully appear from a careful comparison of their respective systems. The moral part of the Stoical philosophy partook of the defects of its origin. It may as justly be objected against the Stoics as the Cynics that they assumed an artificial severity of manners, and a tone of virtue above the condition of man. Their doctrine of moral wisdom was an ostentatious display of words, in which little regard was paid to nature and reason. It professed to raise human nature to a degree of perfection before unknown; but its real effect was merely to amuse the ear, and captivate the fancy with fictions that can never be realized. The Stoical doctrine concerning Nature is as follows: according to Zeno and his followers, there existed from eternity a dark and confused chaos, in which were contained the first principles of all future beings. This chaos being at length arranged, and emerging into variable forms, became the world, as it now subsists. The world, or nature, is that whole which comprehends all things, and of which all things are parts and members. The universe, though one whole, contains two principles, distinct from elements, one passive and the other active. The passive principle is pure matter without qualities; the active principle is reason, or God. This is the fundamental doctrine of the Stoics concerning nature. If the doctrine of Plato, which derives the human mind from the soul of the world, has a tendency towards enthusiasm, much more must this be the case with the Stoical doctrine, which supposes that all human souls have immediately proceeded from, and will at last return into, the Divine Nature. As regards a Divine Providence, if we compare the popular language of the Stoics upon this head with their general system, and explain the former with the fundamental principles of the latter, we shall find that the agency of Deity is, according to them, nothing more than the active motion of a celestial ether, or fire, possessed of intelligence, which at first gave form to the shapeless mass of gross matter, and being always essentially united to the visible world, by the same necessary agency, preserves its order and harmony. Providence, in the Stoic creed, is only another name for absolute necessity, or fate, to which God and Matter, or the universe, which consists of both, is immutably subject. The Stoic doctrine of a resurrection of the body, upon which Seneca has written with so much elegance, must not be confounded with the Christian doctrine; for, according to the Sto-ics, men return to life, not by the voluntary appointment of a wise and merciful God, but by the law of fate; and are not renewed for the enjoyment of a better and happier condition, but drawn back into their former state of imperfection and misery. Accordingly Seneca says, "This restoration many would reject, were it not that their renovated life is accompanied with a total oblivion of past events." Upon the principles of Physics depends the whole Stoic doctrine of Morals. Concerning God to be the principal part of nature, by whose energy all bodies are formed, moved, and arranged; and human reason to be a portion of the Divinity; it was their fundamental doctrine in ethics, that in human life, one ultimate end ought for its own sake to be pursued; and that this end is, to live agreeably to nature, that is, to be conformed to the law of fate by which the world is governed, and to the reason of that Divine and Celestial fire which animates all things. Since man is himself a microcosm, composed, like the world, of matter and a rational principle, it becomes him to live as a part of the great whole, and to accommodate all his desires and pursuits to the general arrangement of nature. Thus, to live according to nature, as the Stoics teach, is virtue; and virtue is itself happiness; for the Supreme Good is, to live according to a just conception of the real nature of things, choosing that which is itself eligible, and rejecting the contrary. Every man, having within himself a capacity of discerning and following the law of nature, has his happiness in his own power, and is a divinity to himself. Wisdom consists in distinguishing good from evil. Good is that which produces happiness according to the nature of a rational being. Since those things only are truly good which are becoming and virtuous; and virtue, which is seated in the mind, is alone sufficient for happiness; external things contribute nothing towards happiness, and therefore are not in themselves good. The wise man will only value riches, honour, beauty, and other external enjoyments, as means and instruments of virtue; for, in every condition he is happy in the possession of a mind accommodated to nature. Pain, which does not belong to the mind, is no evil. The wise man will be happy in the midst of torture. All external things are indifferent, since they cannot affect the happiness of man. Every virtue being a conformity to nature, and every vice a deviation from it, all virtues and vices are equal. One act of beneficence, or justice, is not more truly so than another; one fraud is not more a fraud than another; therefore there is no difference in the essential nature of moral actions, than that some are vicious and others virtuous. This is the doctrine which Horace ridicules in his 4th satire, 1st book. The Stoics advanced many extravagant assertions concerning their wise man. For example, that he feels neither pain nor pleasure; that he exercises no pity; that he is free from faults; that he is Divine; that he does all things well; that he alone is great, noble, ingenious; that he is a prophet, a priest, a king; and the like. These paradoxical vauntings are humorously ridiculed by Horace. In order to understand all this, we must bear in mind that the Stoics did not suppose such a man actually to exist, but that they framed in their imagination an image of perfection, towards which every man should continually aspire. All the extravagant notions which are to be found in their writings on this subject, may be referred to their general principle of the entire sufficiency of virtue to happiness, and the consequent indifference of all external circumstances. The sum of man's duty, according to the Stoics, with respect to himself, is to subdue his passions of joy and sorrow, hope and fear, and even pity. He who is, in this respect, perfectly master of himself, is a wise man; and in proportion as we approach a state of apathy, we advance towards perfection. A wise man, moreover, may justly and reasonably withdraw from life whenever he finds it expedient; not only because life and death are among those things which are in their nature indifferent, but also because life may be less consistent with virtue than death. Concerning the whole moral system of the Stoics, it must be remarked, that, although deserving of high encomium for the purity, extent, and variety of its doctrines, and although it must be confessed, that in many select passages of the Stoic writings it appears exceedingly brilliant, it is nevertheless founded in false notions of nature and of man, and is raised to a degree of refinement which is extravagant and impracticable. The piety which it teaches is nothing more than a quiet submission to irresistible fate. The self-command which it enjoins annihilates the best affections of the human heart. The indulgence which it grants to suicide is inconsistent, not only with the general principles of piety, but even with that constancy which was the height of Stoical perfection. And even its moral doctrine of benevolence is tainted with the fanciful principle which lay at the foundation of the whole Stoic system, that every being is a portion of one Great Whole, from which it would be unnatural and impious to attempt a separation.]—*Cic. ZENOBIÀ, a queen of Iberia, wife to Rhadamistus. She accompanied her husband when he was banished from his kingdom by the Armenians, but as she was unable to follow him far on account of her pregnancy, she entreated him to murder her. Rhadamistus long hesitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her clothes kept her up on the surface of the water, where she was found by some shepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preserved, and she was carried to Tiridates, who acknowledged her as queen. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 51.—Septimia, a celebrated princess of Palmyra, who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her husband, which, according to some authors, she is said to have hastened, Zenobia reigned in the east as regent of her infant children, who were honoured with the title of Cæsars. [vid. Odenatus.] She assumed the name of Augusta, and she appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herself to be styled the queen of the east. [Her authority was acknowledged by a large portion of Asia Minor when Aurelian succeeded to the empire. Envious of her power, and determined to dispossess her of some of the rich provinces comprehended in her dominions, he marched at the head of a powerful army to Asia. Having defeated the queen's general near Antioch, he compelled her to retreat to Emesa. Under the walls of this city another engagement was fought, in which the emperor was again victorious.] The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to support a siege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almost exhausted his stores, he proposed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with disdain by the warlike princess. Her hopes of victory, however, soon vanished, and though she harassed the Romans night and day by continual sallies from the walls, and the working of her military engines, she despaired of success when she heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Persia, and the east, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night; but Aurelian, who was apprised of her escape, pursued her, and she was caught as she was crossing the river Euphrates. [She was brought into the presence of Aurelian, and tried before a tribunal at Emesa, Aurelian himself presiding. The soldiers were clamorous for her death, but she, in a manner unworthy of her former fame, saved her own life by throwing the blame on her counsellors, especially on Longinus, who was in consequence put to death. Zenobia was carried to Rome to grace the emperor's triumph, and was led along in chains of gold. She is said to have almost sunk beneath the weight of jewels with which she was adorned on that occasion.] She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large possessions near Tibur, where she was permitted to live the rest of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majesty which became a queen of the east and a warlike princess. Her children were patronized by the emperor, and married to persons of the first distinction at Rome. Zenobia has been admired not only for her military abilities, but also for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of useful learning, and spoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She composed an abridgment of the history of the oriental nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the ancients. She received no less honour from the patronage she afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favourites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has also been praised for her great chastity, and her constancy, though she betrayed too often her propensities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midst of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273d year of the Christian era. Aur. Vict.—Zos. &c.—A town of Syria, on the Euphrates.

ZENODORUS, a sculptor in the age of Nero. He made a statue of Mercury, as also a colossus for the emperor, which was 110 or 120 feet high, and which was consecrated to the sun. The head of this colossus was some time after broken off by Vespasian, who placed there the head of an Apollo surrounded with seven beams, each of which was seven feet and a half long. From this famous colossus the modern Coliseum, whose ruins are now so much admired at Rome, took its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

Zephyr was said to produce flowers and fruits by the sweetness of his breath. He had a temple at Athens, where he was represented as a young man of delicate form, with two wings on his shoulders, and with his head covered with all sorts of flowers. He was supposed to be the same as the west wind. [In the days of Homer the idea of darkness was always associated with the western regions of the world, and hence the wind Zephyrus derived its name from ζοφος, tenebræ. (vid. remarks under the article Pluto). ZEBYNTHUS, a town of Samothrace, with a cave sacred to Hecate. The epithet of Zerynthius is applied to Apollo, and also to Venus. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 19.—Liv. 39, c. 41.

ZETHES, ZETES, or ZETUS, a son of Boreas, king of Thrace and Orthyia, who accompanied, with his brother Calais, the Argonauts to Colchis. In Bithynia, the two brothers, who are represented with wings, delivered Phineus from the continual persecution of the Harpies, and drove these monsters as far as the islands called Strophades, where at last they were stopped by Iris, who promised them that Phineus should no longer be tormented by them. They were both killed, as some say, by Hercules, during the Argonautic expedition, and were changed into those winds which generally blow 8 or 10 days before the dog-star appears, and are called Prodrimi by the Greeks. Their sister Cleopatra married Phineus, king of Bithynia. Orpheus. Arg.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 15.—Hygin. fab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 716.—Paus. 3, c. 18.—Val. Flacc.

ZETUS, or ZETHUS, a son of Jupiter and Antiope, brother to Amphion. The two brothers were born on Mount Cithæron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of her father Nycteus. When they had attained the years of manhood, they collected a number of their friends to avenge the injuries which their mother had suffered from Lycus, the successor of Nycteus on the throne of Thebes, and his wife Dirce. Lycus was put to death, and his wife tied to the tail of a wild bull, that dragged her over rocks and precipices till she died. The crown of Thebes was seized by the two brothers, not only as the reward of this victory, but as their inheritance, and Zethus surrounded the capital of his dominions with a strong wall, while his brother amused himself with playing on his lyre. Music and verses were disagreeable to Zethus, and, according to some, he prevailed upon his brother no longer to pursue so unproductive a study. Hygin. fab. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 6, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 and 10.—Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 41.

ZEGUIS, [or Zeugitana], a portion of Africa, in which Carthage was. The other division was called Byzacium. Isidor. 14, 5.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

ZEUGMA, [or the Bridge], the name of the principal passage of the river Euphrates, south-west of Edessa. An ancient fortress by which it was commanded, is still called Roum-Cala, or the Roman Castle; to which may be added, that on the opposite shore there is a place called Zeugme.]

ZEUS, a name of Jupiter among the Greeks, expressive of his being the father of mankind, and by whom all things live. [vid. remarks under the article Jupiter.]

ZEUXIDAMUS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was father of Archidamus, and grandson of Theopompus, and was succeeded by his son Archidamus. Paus. 3, c. 7.

ZEUXIS, a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which some suppose to be the Heraclea of Sicily. He flourished about 468 years before the Christian era, and was the disciple of Apollodorus, and contemporary with Parrhasius. In the art of painting he not only surpassed all his contemporaries, but also his master, and became so sensible, and at the same time so proud, of the value of his pieces, that he refused to sell them, observing that no sum of money, however great, was sufficient to buy them. [According to Quintilian, he is the first artist who understood the proper management of light and shade, and excelled in colouring; but, being ambitious of imitating the strength and grandeur of Homer's manner, he is charged with giving unsuitable bulk to the heads, and massiveness to the limbs, of his figures. Notwithstanding, however, these alleged imperfections, he attained distinguished excellence.] His most celebrated paintings were his Jupiter sitting on a throne, surrounded by the gods; his Hercules strangling the serpents in the presence of his affrighted parents; his modest Penelope; and his Helen, which was afterwards placed in the temple of Juno Lacinia, in Italy. This last piece he had painted at the request of the people of Crotona; and, that he might not be without a model, they sent him the most beautiful of their virgins. Zeuxis examined their charms, and retained five, from whose elegance and graces united, he conceived in his mind the form of the most perfect woman in the universe, which his pencil at last executed with wonderful success. His contest with Parrhasius is well known; [vid. Parrhasius.] but though he represented nature in such perfection, and copied all her beauties with such exactness, he often found himself deceived. He painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodness of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvass. But he soon acknowledged that the whole was an ill executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with sufficient expression to terrify the birds. According to some, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 1.—Plut. in Par. &c.—Quintil.

ZOILUS, a sophist and grammarian of Amphipolis, B. C. 259. He rendered himself known by his severe criticisms on the works of Isocrates and Plato, and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Homeromastix, or the chastiser of Homer. He presented his criticisms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he starved for want of bread. Some say that Zoilus was cruelly stoned to death, or exposed on a cross, by order of Ptolemy, while others support, that he was burnt alive at Smyrna. [According to another account he recited his invectives against Homer at the Olympic games, and was thrown from a rock for his offence.] The name of Zoilus is generally applied to austere critics. The works of this unfortunate grammarian are lost. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. de Rem. Am. 266.

ZONA, a town of Thrace on the Ægean Sea, where the woods are said to have followed the strains of Orpheus. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Herodot.

ZONARAS, one of the Byzantine historians, whose Greek Annales were edited 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1686.

ZOPYRUS, a Persian, son of Megabyzus, who, to show his attachment to Darius, the son of Hystaspes, while he besieged Babylon, cut off his ears and nose, and fled to the enemy, telling them that he had received such a treatment from his royal master because he had advised him to raise the siege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more strongly expressed than in what he used often to say, that he had rather have Zopyrus not mutilated than twenty Babylons. Herodot. 3, c. 154, &c.—Plut. in Apoph. reg. 3.—Justin. 1, c. 10.—A physician in the age of Mithridates. He gave the monarch a description of an antidote which would prevail against all sorts of poisons. The experiment was tried upon criminals, and succeeded.—A physician in the age of Plutarch.—An officer of Argos, who cut off the head of Pyrrhus.

ZOROANDA, a part of Taurus, [where the Tigris opened a subterraneous passage. vid. Tigris.] Plin. 6, c. 27.

ZOROASTER, an eminent Bactrian philosopher, supposed to have lived in the age of Ninus, king of Assyria, some time before the Trojan war. [vid. end of this article.] According to Justin, he first invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himself known by his deep and acute researches in philosophy, the origin of the world, and the study of astronomy. He was respected by his countrymen for his abilities as a lawgiver and a philosopher; and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are still found in numbers in the wilds of Persia, and the extensive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoroaster admitted no visible object of devotion except fire.

which he considered as the most proper emblem of a Supreme Being; which doctrines seem to have been preserved by Numa in the worship and ceremonies he instituted in honour of Vesta. According to some of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, the regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are still extant, and they have been lately introduced in Europe in a French translation by M. Anquetil. The age of Zoroaster is so little known, that many speak of two, three, four, and even six lawgivers of that name. Some authors, who support that two persons only of this name flourished, describe the first as an astronomer, living in Babylon, 2459 years B. C. whilst the era of the other, who is supposed to have been a native of Persia, and the restorer of the religion of the Magi, is fixed 589, and by some 519 years B. C. [According to Hyde, Prideaux, and many others of the learned, Zoroaster was the same with the Zerdusht of the Persians, who was a great patriarch of the Magi, and lived between the beginning of the reign of Cyrus and the latter end of that of Darius Hystaspes. Dr. Warburton, however, censures Hyde and Prideaux, for making an early Bactrian lawgiver to be a late Persian false prophet; and says, that this whole story of him is a mere fable, contradicting all learned antiquity, and supported only by the romantic relations of late Persian writers under the caliphs.] Justin. 1, c. 1.—August. de Civ. 21, c. 14.—Oros. 1.—Plin. 7, c. 10, l. 30, c. 1.

ZOSIMUS, an officer in the reign of Theodosius the younger, about the year 410 of the Christian era. He wrote the history of the Roman emperors in Greek, from the age of Augustus to the beginning of the 5th century, of which only the five first books, and the beginning of the sixth, are extant. In the first of these he is very succinct in his account from the time of Augustus to the reign of Diocletian, but in the succeeding he becomes more diffuse and interesting. His composition is written with elegance, but not much fidelity, and the author showed his malevolence against the Christians in his history of Constantine and some of his associates. [There are many reasons which induce the belief that the work of Zosimus was not published in his lifetime, one of the strongest of which is the boldness with which he speaks of the Christian emperors. It is probable that he intended to continue the work to his own times, a design which his death prevented. Certain negligences of style, which indicate the absence of a revision on the part of the author, strongly countenance this supposition.] The best editions of Zosimus are that of Cellarius, 8vo. Jenæ, 1728, and that of Reitemier, 8vo. Lips. 1784.

ZOSTERIA, a surname of Minerva. She had two statues under that name in the city of Thebes in Bœotia. The word signified girt, or armed for battle, words synonymous among the ancients. Paus. 9, c. 17.—Hom. Il. 2, v. 478, l. 11, v. 15.

ZUCHIS, a lake to the east of the Syrtis Minor, with a town of the same name, famous for a purple dye, and salt-fish. Strab. 17.

ZYGIA, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage, (a ζυγνυμι, jungo). She is the same as the Pronuba of the Latins. Pindar.—Pollux. 3, c. 3.

ZYGOPOLIS, a town of Cappadocia, on the borders of Colchis. Strab. 12.

ZYGRITÆ, a nation of Libya.

[The Grecian measures, from which the Romans borrowed theirs, were commonly taken from the members of a human body. Thus, Δακτυλος, a finger's breadth; Δωρον, a hand's breadth, or four fingers; Λιχας, the space between the fore-finger and thumb, when the fingers are extended. Οργυια, the length of the hand, from the wrist to the extremities of the longest finger; Σπιθαμη, the space from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger extended; Πους, a foot, or four hands' breadth; Πυγμα, from the elbow to the extremity of the hand with the fingers clasped; Πυγυια, from the elbow to the second joint of the fingers, or a cubit with the fingers inflected; Πυγυια, from the elbow to the extremity of one middle finger, to the extremity of the other, with the arms extended, measured across the breast. As regards the stadium, according to all the Greek and Roman writers down to Dio Cassius, eight stadia made a Roman mile; in Dio Cassius (52. c. 21.) seven and a half stadia are said to constitute a Roman mile—in Plutarch (Vit. Gracch.) eight stadia are stated as being more than a mile, according to a conjecture of Ideler, by eight feet. At a still later period, the length of the stadium was increased, so that seven made a Roman mile.]

[The same remark will apply to the origin of the Roman measures, as to that of the Greeks. Thus, Digitus, a digit, or finger's breadth; Pollux, a thumb's breadth, an inch; for this the term Uncia is substituted rather improperly in the table. This latter term denotes the twelfth part of any thing, and here of a Pes, or foot; (una ex duodecim partibus). Palmus, a hand's breadth, or palm; Pes, a foot; Palmipes, a foot and a hand's breadth; Cubitus, a cubit, from the tip of the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger; and the fourth part of a well-proportioned man's stature; Gradus, a step of a full grown man; Passus, a pace, including a double step; or the space from the place where the foot is taken up, to that where it is set down; for remarks on the Stadium, see preceding page. Each Roman digitus was supposed equal to four barley-corns (Frontin. de Aqueduct. 1, 2.) But the English make their inch only three barley-corns.]

The Grecian square measures were the plethron or acre, containing 1,444, as some say, or as others report 10,000 square feet; and the aroura, which was half the plethron. The aroura of the Egyptians was the square of 100 cubits.

[This statement respecting the $\pi\lambda\epsilon\theta\rho\nu$ is not an accurate one. The $\pi\lambda\epsilon\theta\rho\nu$ was a Grecian measure of length, of 100 feet, as Suidas clearly shows. The Romans, not having Latinized this term, used the word jugerum for it when speaking of Grecian affairs, a custom far from correct, since the jugerum, if we follow the authority of Quintilian, (1, 10, 42,) was 240 feet long, by 120 broad. On the other hand, the Greeks, in treating of Roman affairs, use the term $\pi\lambda\epsilon\theta\rho\nu$ for the Latin jugerum. vid. Perizon. ad Ælian. V. H. 3. 1; Schutz. Lex. Xen. ad voc.]

The Roman square measure was the jugerum, which, like their libra and their as, was divided into twelve parts, called uncia, as the following table shows :

	Unciæ.		Square feet.	Scruples.	English roods.	Square poles.	Square feet.

N. B. The Actus Major was 14400 square feet, equal to a Semis. The Clima was 3600 square feet, equal to a resuncia, or an uncia and a half, and the actus minimus was equal to a sex-tans.

The Roman as or æs, was called so because it was made of brass.

[The etymology of some of the terms used in the above table will make their meaning plainer. Thus, Deunæ, i. e. deest uncia: Dextans, i. e. deest sextans: Dodrans, i. e. deest quadrans: Bes, originally Des, which last is contracted from Duessis, i. e. duæ assis tertie partes (Gronov. de pec. vet. p. 489.): Septunæ, i. e. septem unciæ: Semis, i. e. the half of an as: Quincunx, i. e. quinqve unciæ: Triens, i. e. tres unciæ: Quadrans, i. e. the fourth part of an as: Sextans, i. e. the sixth part of an as: Uncia (contracted from uniciæ, which is the same with uniciæ) i. e. uniciæ pars assis.]

N. B. The Roman ounce is the English avoirdupois ounce, which was anciently divided into seven denarii and eight drachme, and, as they reckoned their denarius equal to an Attic drachma, the Attic weights were $\frac{1}{7}$ th heavier than the correspondent weights among the Romans. † The Greeks divided their obolus into chalci and smaller proportions; some into six chalci, and every chalcus into seven smaller parts, and others divided it into eight chalci, and each chalcus into eight parts.

[Originally ὀβολός and ὀβολός were but the same word differently pronounced, and the ὀβολός was originally of iron or copper, in form like a spit. A handful of these formed a δραχμή. Plat. Lys. 17. Hence the primitive meaning of δραχμή, viz. a handful, was applied to a weight or coin equivalent to six ὀβολοί, or small spikes. The πυλαγρον, also, had originally a reference to weight, its primitive meaning being a balance, or pair of scales; like the Latin Libra.]

N. B. There was also another Attic talent which consisted of 80, or, according to some, of 100 mina. It must, however, be remembered, that every mina contains 100 drachmae, and every talent 60 mina. The talents differ according to the different standard of their mina and drachmae, as the following table indicates :

N. B. The drachma, and the didrachmon, were silver, the others generally of brass. The tridrachmon, triobolus, &c. were sometimes coined. The drachma and the denarius, are here supposed to be equal, though often the former exceeded in weight. The gold coin among the Greeks was the stater aureus, which weighed two Attic drachmae, or half the stater argenteus, and was worth 25 Attic drachmae, of silver, or in English money
 Or, according to the proportion of gold to silver, at present
 The Stater Cysicus exchanged for 28 Attic drachmae, or The Stater Philippi and Stater Alexandri were of the same value.
 The Stater Darius, according to Josephus, was worth 50 Attic drachmae, or The Stater Cresi was of the same value.

N. B. The denarius, victoriatius, sestertius, and sometimes the as, were of silver, the others were of brass. The triens, sextans, uncia, sestuita, and dupondius, were sometimes coined of brass.

The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which generally weighed double the denarius. The value of it, according to the first proportion of coinage mentioned by Pliny, was

Or, according to the proportion of coinage at present.

According to Tacitus, as it was afterwards valued and exchanged for 25 denarii.

[The sestertius was originally equivalent to two asses and a half; hence it was usually expressed by the letters H. S. an abbreviation either for L. L. S. (i. e. Libra, libra, semis), or for l. S. (i. e. 2½). The derivation of the word, from semis and tertius, is analogous. Thus, the first an as, the second an as, the third a half as. So in the Greek denominations for fractional money, τριτον μισαλλαντον, i. e. 2½ talents. vid. Matthiæ G. G. vol. 1. p. 176. The value of coin underwent many changes during the existence of the Roman republic, and stood as Pliny mentions it, as follows :

 a scruple of gold was worth 20 sestertii; and in Nero's reign, of the pound of gold, 20 denarii aurei; and in Nero's reign, of the pound of gold, 45 denarii aurei.

N. B. In the above tables of money, it is to be observed, that the silver has been reckoned at 5s. and gold at 4l. per ounce. A talent of gold among the Jews was worth 5475l. and one of silver 342l. 3s. 9d. The greater talent of the Romans was worth 99l. 6s. 8d. and the less 60l. or, as some say, 75l. and the great talent 1125l. The value of the Roman pondo is not precisely known, though some suppose it equivalent to an Attic mina, or 3l. 4s. 7d. It is used indifferently by ancient authors for as, as, and mina, and was supposed to consist of 100, or 96 denarii. It is to be observed, that whenever the word pondo is joined to numbers, it signifies the same as libra, but when it is used with other words it bears the same signification as the equivalent to a sestertius, and though the words sestertius and nummus, when mentioned as a sum of money, was supposed to be intimate no more than either does separately. The word nummus, when mentioned as a sum of money, was supposed to be intimate no more than either does separately. We must particularly remark, that in reckoning their sesterces, the Romans had an art which can be rendered intelligible by the observation of these rules : If a numeral noun agreed in case, gender, and number with the word sestertius, it denoted precisely as many sesterti ; as, for example, decem sesterti was ten sesterti. If a numeral noun of another case was joined with the genitive plural of sestertius ; as, so many thousand, as decem sestertium signifies so many thousand sesterti. If the adverb numeral was joined, it denoted so many hundred thousand, as decies sestertium was ten hundred thousand sesterti. If the numeral adverb was put by itself, the signification was not altered, therefore decies vigesias, &c. in a sentence, imply as many hundred thousand sesterti, or hundred sestertia, as if the word sestertium was expressed.

The denarius, which was the chief silver coin used at Rome, received its name because it contained denos aris, ten asses. The as is often expressed by an L. because it was one pound weight ; and the sestertius, because it was equivalent to two pound and a half of brass, is frequently denoted by H. S. or L. L. S.

The Roman libra contained twelve ounces of silver, and was worth about 3l. sterling. The Roman talent was supposed to be equivalent to twenty-four sestertia, or nearly 193l. sterling.
